

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—

Paragraph of the Queen's Speech read.

Moved, "That on the 25th of February this House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to take into consideration the 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) .. 214
After long debate, Motion agreed to.

The following are the Resolutions referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer :—

This House having, in the last Session of Parliament, assented to the Second Reading of a Bill, intituled "A Bill to extend the right of Voting at Elections of Members of Parliament in England and Wales," is of opinion,

1. That the number of Electors for Counties and Boroughs in England and Wales ought to be increased.

2. That such increase may best be effected by both reducing the value of the qualifying Tenement in Counties and Boroughs, and by adding other Franchises not dependent on such value.

3. That, while it is desirable that a more direct Representation should be given to the Labouring Class, it is contrary to the Constitution of this Realm to give to any one class or interest a predominating power over the rest of the Community.

4. That the Occupation Franchise in Counties and Boroughs shall be based upon the principle of Rating.

5. That the principle of Plurality of Votes, if adopted by Parliament, would facilitate the settlement of the Borough Franchise on an extensive basis.

6. That it is expedient to revise the existing Distribution of Seats.

7. That in such revision it is not expedient that any Borough now represented in Parliament should be wholly Disfranchised.

8. That, in revising the existing Distribution of Seats, this House will acknowledge, as its main consideration, the expediency of supplying Representation to places not at present represented, and which may be considered entitled to that privilege.

9. That it is expedient that provision should be made for the better prevention of Bribery and Corruption at Elections.

10. That it is expedient that the system of Registration of Voters in Counties should be assimilated, as far as possible, to that which prevails in Boroughs.

11. That it shall be open to every Parliamentary Elector, if he think fit, to record his vote by means of a polling paper, duly signed and authenticated.

12. That provision be made for diminishing the distance which Voters have to travel for the purpose of recording their votes, so that no expenditure for such purpose shall hereafter be legal.

13. That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to form and submit to the consideration of Parliament a scheme for new and enlarged Boundaries of the existing Parliamentary Boroughs where the population extends beyond the limit now assigned to such Boroughs ; and to fix, subject to the decision of Parliament, the Boundaries of such other Boroughs as Parliament may deem fit to be represented in this House.

Valuation of Property Bill—

Motion for Leave (Mr. Hunt) 250

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill to provide for a Common basis of value for the purposes of Government and Local Taxation, and to promote uniformity in the assessment of Rateable Property in England, ordered (Mr. Hunt, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Gathorne Hardy) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 12.]

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, IN THE
SECOND SESSION OF THE NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND APPOINTED TO MEET 1 FEBRUARY, 1866, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 5 FEBRUARY, 1867, IN THE THIRTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, February 5, 1867.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 10th day of August to the 25th day of October; thence to the 20th day of November; thence to the 15th day of January; thence to the 5th day of February; met this day for Despatch of Business.

The Session of PARLIAMENT was opened by THE QUEEN in Person.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY, being seated on the Throne, adorned with Her Crown and Regal Ornaments, and attended by Her Officers of State:—THE PRINCE OF WALES
(in his Robes) sitting in his Chair on HER
VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MAJESTY's right hand—(the Lords being in their Robes)—commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, through the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, to let the Commons know "It is Her Majesty's Pleasure they attend Her immediately, in this House."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, taking Directions from HER MAJESTY, said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"IN again recurring to your Advice and Assistance, I am happy to inform you that My Relations with Foreign Powers are on a friendly and satisfactory Footing.

"I HOPE that the Termination of the War in which Prussia, Austria, and Italy have been engaged may lead to the Establishment of a durable Peace in Europe.

"I HAVE suggested to the Government of the United States a Mode by which Questions pending between the Two Countries arising out of the late Civil War may receive amicable Solution, and which, if met, as I trust it will be, in a corresponding Spirit, will remove all Grounds of possible Misunderstanding, and promote Relations of cordial Friendship.

"THE War between Spain and the Republics of Chili and Peru still continues, the good Offices of My Government, in conjunction with that of The Emperor of the French, having failed to effect a Reconciliation. If either by Agreement between the Parties themselves, or by the Mediation of any other friendly Power, Peace shall be restored, the Object which I have had in view will equally be attained.

"DISCONTENT prevailing in some Provinces of the Turkish Empire has broken out in actual Insurrection in Crete. In common with My Allies, The Emperor of the French and The Emperor of Russia, I have abstained from any active Interference in these internal Disturbances, but Our joint Efforts have been directed to bringing about improved Relations between the Porte and its Christian Subjects, not inconsistent with the sovereign Rights of The Sultan.

"THE protracted Negotiations which arose out of the Acceptance by Prince Charles of Hohenzollern of the Government of the Danubian Principalities have been happily terminated by an Arrangement to which the Porte has given its ready Adhesion, and which has been sanctioned by the Concurrence of all the Powers, Signataries of the Treaty of 1856.

"RESOLUTIONS in favour of a more intimate Union of the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have been passed by their several Legislatures; and Delegates duly authorized and representing all Classes of Colonial Party and Opinion have concurred in the Conditions upon which such an Union may be best effected. In accordance with] their Wishes a Bill will be submitted to you, which, by the Consolidation of Colonial Interests and Resources, will give Strength to the several Provinces as Members of the same Empire, and animated by Feelings of Loyalty to the same Sovereign.

"I HAVE heard with deep Sorrow that the Calamity of Famine has pressed heavily on My Subjects in some Parts of India. Instructions were issued to My Government in that Country to make the utmost Exertions to mitigate the Distress which prevailed during the Autumn of last Year. The Blessing of an abundant Harvest has since that Time materially improved the Condition of the suffering Districts.

"THE persevering Efforts and unscrupulous Assertions of treasonable Conspirators abroad have, during the last Autumn, excited the Hopes of some disaffected Persons in Ireland, and the Apprehensions of the loyal Population; but the firm, yet temperate Exercise of the Powers entrusted to the Executive, and the Hostility manifested against the Conspiracy by Men of all Classes and Creeds, have greatly tended to restore Public Confidence, and have rendered hopeless any Attempt to disturb the general Tranquillity. I trust that you may consequently be enabled to dispense with the Continuance of any exceptional Legislation for that Part of My Dominions.

"I ACKNOWLEDGE, with deep Thankfulness to Almighty God, the great Decrease that has taken place in the Cholera, and in the Pestilence which has attacked our Cattle; but the continued Prevalence of the latter in some Foreign Countries, and its occasional Re-appearance in this, will still render necessary some special Measures of Precaution; and I trust that the Visitation of the former will lead to increased Attention to those Sanitary Measures which Experience has shown to be the best Preventive.

"ESTIMATING as of the highest Importance an adequate Supply of pure and wholesome Water, I have directed the Issue of a Commission to inquire into the best Means of permanently securing such a Supply for the Metropolis, and for the principal Towns in densely-peopled Districts of the Kingdom.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I HAVE directed the Estimates for the ensuing Year to be laid before you. They have been prepared with a due Regard to Economy, and to the Requirements of the public Service.

"You will, I am assured, give your ready Assent to a moderate Expenditure calculated to improve the Condition of My Soldiers, and to lay the Foundation of an efficient Army of Reserve,

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"YOUR Attention will again be called to the State of the Representation of the People in Parliament; and I trust that your Deliberations, conducted in a Spirit of Moderation and mutual Forbearance, may lead to the Adoption of Measures which, without unduly disturbing the Balance of political Power, shall freely extend the Elective Franchise.

"THE frequent Occurrence of Disagreements between Employers of Labour and their Workmen, causing much private Suffering and public Loss, and occasionally leading, as is alleged, to Acts of Outrage and Violence, has induced Me to issue a Commission to inquire into and report upon the Organization of Trades Unions and other Associations, whether of Workmen or Employers, with Power to suggest any Improvement of the Law for their mutual Benefit. Application will be made to you for Parliamentary Powers, which will be necessary to make this Inquiry effective.

"I HAVE directed Bills to be laid before you for the Extension of the beneficial Provisions of the Factory Acts to other Trades specially reported on by the Royal Commission on the Employment of Children, and for the better Regulation, according to the Principle of those Acts, of Workshops where Women and Children are largely employed.

"THE Condition of the Mercantile Marine has attracted My serious Attention. Complaints are made that the Supply of Seamen is deficient, and that the Provisions for their Health and Discipline on board Ship are imperfect. Measures will be submitted to you with a view to increase the Efficiency of this important Service.

"I HAVE observed with Satisfaction the Rélaxations recently introduced into the Navigation Laws of France. I have expressed to The Emperor of the French My Readiness to submit to Parliament a Proposal for the Extinction, on equitable Terms, of the Exemptions from local Charges on Shipping which are still enjoyed by a limited Number of Individuals in British Ports; and His Imperial Majesty has, in anticipation of this Step, already admitted British Ships to the Advantage of the new Law. A Bill upon this Subject will forthwith be laid before you.

"A BILL will also be submitted to you for making better Provision for the Arrangement of the Affairs of Railway Companies which are unable to meet their Engagements.

"MEASURES will be submitted to you for Improving the Management of sick and other Poor in the Metropolis, and for a Re-distribution of some of the Charges for Relief therein.

"YOUR Attention will also be called to the Amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy; to the Consolidation of the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Admiralty; and to the Means of disposing, with greater Despatch and Frequency, of the increasing Business in the Superior Courts of Common Law and at the Assizes.

"THE Relations between Landlord and Tenant in Ireland have engaged My anxious Attention, and a Bill will be laid before you which, without interfering with the Rights of Property, will offer direct Encouragement to Occupiers of Land to improve their Holdings, and provide a simple Mode of obtaining Compensation for permanent Improvements.

"I COMMEND to your careful Consideration these and other Measures which will be brought before you; and I pray that your Labours may, under the Blessing of Providence, conduce to the Prosperity of the Country, and the Happiness of My People."

Then HER MAJESTY retired.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in rising to move a humble Address in answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne, said: My Lords, in approaching my arduous and responsible task, I cannot but wish it had been committed to some Peer of greater experience in your Lordships' House than I can in any way pretend to. The topics suggested by the Speech are so numerous, so varied, and so important, that it will be impossible to give each of them, in so short a time, anything like the consideration they deserve. I will, however, presume to touch upon a few of the principal matters referred to.

Your Lordships will, I have no doubt, fully concur with me in the belief that the first topic in the Speech has been so placed from a due regard to its importance—for to this country the question of peace or war is one of the deepest interest. It must, therefore, be a matter of great satisfaction to your Lordships to be assured that Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue to be of the most friendly description. When you remember that so recently as last year the peace of Europe was disturbed by a sanguinary war, it is, indeed, satisfactory for us to learn that Her Majesty can express a confident hope in the duration of peace in Europe. The blessings of peace are so great that it is impossible to overrate them. It is, therefore, matter for further congratulation that those difficult questions which exist between the United States and this country—questions which have given rise to a considerable amount of apprehension in the minds of a large portion of the population of this country, are now in the way of a speedy and satisfactory solution. My Lords, I believe that but one feeling animates the people of this country; and that is a most cordial desire to be on friendly terms with the people of the great American Republic. And while it is right and proper for this country to maintain what they may fairly regard as their own right, it is not unbecoming for a great nation like ours, should feelings of irritation arise, to make such concessions as we may make without injury to our honour in order to secure the continuance of friendly relations with Foreign Powers, which are so important to our prosperity. My Lords, Her Majesty has told us that She regrets the continuance of the war between Spain and Chile and Peru; and we can heartily join with her in the hope that peace between those belligerents may soon be restored. During the recess your Lordships' attention has doubtless been called to the insurrection in Crete, and your Lordships had, no doubt, read with heartfelt pity the record of the heroic and gallant struggles which have taken place on that island. I think it is a matter of some satisfaction that the insurrection took place while Parliament was not sitting. I cannot forget the struggle which was made by a gallant nation—the Poles—and that during that struggle injudicious expressions used by Members of Parliament were construed into meaning that this country was prepared to afford a far larger amount of sympathy for the cause than was ever intended. I think that the Members of the Legislature should bear in mind the great responsibility which attaches to their utterances. We have seen the result in the case of Poland, and I cannot but rejoice that the insurrection in Crete took place when this House was not sitting, because expressions of sympathy might have been regarded as promises of material assistance which we were unable to afford. The House will, however, learn with great satisfaction that Her Majesty has been enabled, in common with her allies, to bring about improved relations between the Porte and its Christian subjects not inconsistent with the sovereign rights of the Sultan. My Lords, that observation applies not only to Crete, but also to the Danubian Principalities, an arrangement having been made to which the Porte had given its ready adhesion, and which has been sanctioned by all the Powers signatories of the Treaty of 1856.

While, however, my Lords, we look with satisfaction to our relations with Foreign Powers, we should not lose sight of the interests of those colonies which, sheltered under our fostering care, have grown and increased in strength until they have assumed the importance and responsibilities of large communities. It must accordingly be gratifying to know that a Bill is to be introduced for the consolidation of their interests and resources. We should all be heartily glad if the same love of peace and desire for union which prevails in our North American Colonies existed in every other portion of the British Empire. Unhappily a widely-spread conspiracy has for some years disturbed the security of the loyal portion of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. But we have at least the satisfaction of knowing that the designs of the misguided men who engaged in that senseless undertaking have been completely defeated by the prudent precautions which have been taken by the Government, and also to some extent, we may hope, by the reviving loyalty of some of the persons who had been deluded by the machinations of the leading conspirators. The danger has now, in a great measure, passed away; and, happily, the spirit of disaffection has extended to only a small portion of the population of Ireland, while the whole course of those events has shown that the vast majority of that population, of all creeds and classes, are sincerely attached to the Crown and Government of the United Kingdom.

Her Majesty expresses the deep sorrow with which She has heard of the dreadful famine which since last summer has afflicted some portion of Her Indian subjects; and there is not one among your Lordships who does not share in that feeling, and who will not rejoice with Her Majesty in the termination of so great a calamity. At the meeting of Parliament at the commencement of last year, a large portion of the agricultural interest of this country was greatly affected by the cattle plague, which occasioned great suffering and distress in many districts; but your Lordships will hear with satisfaction that by reason of the important measures which were passed by Parliament, or in consequence of the natural dying out of the disease in the winter months, the scourge has passed away. We have, however, since had to meet a more serious peril to our social welfare and prosperity created by a visitation of cholera. That, too, has passed away; but the poison of that disease is so subtle and so deadly, that it is evidently the duty of those charged with the responsibility of Government to take every precaution against the recurrence of such a calamity; and therefore we must learn with satisfaction that a Royal Commission is about to be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the important sanitary subject of the supply of pure water to our towns and cities. While referring to that topic, I will venture to express a hope that the owners of property throughout the country will do all in their power to aid in furthering these efforts for the promotion of the public health, and that they will all in that respect imitate the good example set us by Her Majesty. The Royal Speech afterwards contains a reference to the subject of Parliamentary Reform; and I am sure your Lordships will heartily rejoice to know that there exists at last a prospect of bringing that long-vexed question to a satisfactory settlement. It is impossible for me to say what may be the nature of the proposal Her Majesty's Government will have to submit to Parliament upon this subject; but we must all earnestly hope that it will be one calculated to improve the constitution of the country.

The questions of our sanitary condition and of Parliamentary Reform are no doubt of immense consequence; but I venture to think that in their immediate bearing on the National welfare they must yield to that great danger which is impending over the country in consequence of the baleful operations of the trades unions. We have adopted the principle of free trade in our whole commercial policy; but I believe that freedom of trade cannot exist without freedom of labour, and that this country cannot maintain its position as the industrial centre of the commercial world if the operations of the trades unions restrict the employment of labour and prevent the artisans from making the best use they can of their skill and industry. Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, lays down the doctrine that the patrimony of the working-man consists in his strength and dexterity of hand, and that anything that prevents him from employing that strength and dexterity is a violation of his just rights. The restrictions which are now imposed on the working-men of this country are of a different kind from those which were contemplated by Adam Smith, but they are not the less serious nor less dangerous. It is possibly within the knowledge of your Lordships that important trades and branches of manufactures formerly executed in this country are passing away from us in consequence of the operations of a portion of our artisans; and those artisans not only injure themselves by the course they have thought fit to adopt, but they deprive other people of the opportunity of earning their accustomed wages, and thus they materially diminish the general means of subsistence. I am persuaded that your Lordships will do all you can to render the inquiries of the Royal Commission into this subject as effective as possible. I further believe that you will heartily join in returning your humble thanks to Her Majesty for the interest She has exhibited in the condition of children employed in factories. The factory laws already form one of the brightest pages in our National legislation, and we shall all heartily rejoice if any considerable addition can be made to that legislation during the course of the present Session. Another important subject, to which Her Majesty refers, is the relief of embarrassed railway companies; and it is manifestly desirable that some mode should, if possible, be adopted of enabling them to meet their liabilities. Her Majesty also informs us that the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland is also to engage our attention during the present Session. It is not for me, unacquainted as I am with Ireland, to express any opinion upon that question; but of this I feel assured, that if any simple mode can be provided of giving compensation for permanent improvements, it will go far to settle a question which has disturbed a considerable part of Ireland, and heal a very dangerous sore. I shall be ashamed to trespass any longer on your Lordships' attention, but I cannot prevail on myself to conclude without making one other observation. In these times, when efforts are made to persuade this and other countries that the people of England are dissatisfied with the institutions under which they live, I cannot refrain from noting with satisfaction and pleasure—in which I am sure all your Lordships will share—the enthusiastic reception accorded to the Queen in Her recent visit to one of the great mining districts of the kingdom. Her Majesty was received on that occasion with a most cordial welcome; the highest and the lowest vied with each other in demonstrations of affection to their Sovereign. I venture to think that no occasion could have been more appropriate for Her Majesty to re-appear among Her people, as the national exponent of their sympathies, whether of sorrow or joy, than the inauguration of a monument to the memory of that great Prince whose wisdom diminished the care, as his affection enhanced the happiness, of Her who was at once his Monarch and his wife. The Queen did not need that overwhelming burst of loyalty and attachment to convince Her how dearly prized by Her loving subjects is that personal discharge of duties which, though not essential to State affairs, materially conduce to the chivalrous affection entertained for the person of the Queen. Her Majesty now approaches the completion of the thirtieth year of Her reign, and I venture to think that, in the course of the thousand years during which the long line of Her illustrious ancestors has wielded the sceptre now swayed by Her Majesty's hands, there is no period of thirty years which will justly challenge comparison with that now elapsed, for the attention bestowed on the welfare and prosperity of the people; and I make bold to say that if Parliament in its wisdom should fulfil the designs of the Queen, and apply itself in that spirit of moderation and forbearance, so wisely recommended to us from the Throne, to the consideration of the measures promised in Her Majesty's Speech, this present Session will take no unworthy place among its predecessors of this happy reign. The occasion to which I have referred—the visits to Wolverhampton—affords a convincing testimony that the attention which the Crown and the Legislature have given to the condition of the people has borne abundant fruit in dutiful attachment to the Queen, and in a profound appreciation of the institutions under which it is our blessing to live; and, my Lords, no one can doubt that in the person of the Queen has been fulfilled the prediction of the Poet—

“Entire and sure that monarch's rule must prove
Who founds her greatness on her subjects' love;”

My Lords, I beg to move the following humble Address to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for Her Most Gracious Speech from the Throne :—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

“We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble Thanks to Your Majesty for Your Majesty's gracious Speech:

“We rejoice to learn that Your Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers are on a friendly and satisfactory footing, and we join with Your Majesty in the Hope that the Termination of the War in which Prussia, Austria, and Italy have been engaged may tend to the Establishment of durable Peace in Europe.

“We humbly assure Your Majesty that we learn with Satisfaction that Your Majesty has suggested to the Government of the United States a Mode by which Questions, pending between the Two Countries, arising out of the late Civil War, may receive an amicable Solution, and which, if met, as Your Majesty trusts it will be, in a corresponding Spirit, will remove all Grounds of possible Misunderstanding, and promote Relations of cordial Friendship.

"WITH Your Majesty, we regret the Continuance of the War between Spain and the Republics of Chili and Peru, and we lament that the good Offices of Your Majesty's Government, in conjunction with that of The Emperor of the French, should have failed to have effected a Reconciliation. It will be a Cause of Satisfaction to us, if either by Agreement between the Parties themselves, or by the Mediation of any other friendly Power, Peace should be restored.

"WE have observed with Regret that Discontent prevailing in some Provinces of the Turkish Empire has broken out in actual Insurrection in Crete; but we learn with Satisfaction, that in common with Your Majesty's Allies, The Emperor of the French and The Emperor of Russia, Your Majesty has abstained from any active Interference in those internal Disturbances; and that the Efforts of Your Majesty and Your Allies have been directed to bring about such improved Relations between the Porte and its Christian Subjects as are not inconsistent with the sovereign Rights of The Sultan.

"WE thank Your Majesty for informing us that the protracted Negotiations which arose out of the Acceptance by Prince Charles of Hohen-sollern of the Government of the Danubian Principalities have been happily terminated by an Arrangement to which the Porte has given its ready Adhesion, and which has been sanctioned by the Concurrence of all the Powers, Signatories of the Treaty of 1856.

"WE rejoice to be informed by Your Majesty that Resolutions in favour of a more intimate Union of the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have been passed by their several Legislatures, and that Delegates duly authorized, and representing all Classes of Colonial Party and Opinion, have concurred in the Conditions upon which such an Union may be best effected. We assure Your Majesty that we will give our most careful Attention to the Bill which, in accordance with the Wishes of those Colonies, Your Majesty has directed to be submitted to us, and which, by the Consolidation of Colonial Interests and Resources, will, we trust, give Strength to the several Provinces as Members of the same Empire, and animated by Feelings of Loyalty to the same Sovereign.

"WE have heard with deep Sorrow that the Calamity of Famine has pressed heavily on Your Majesty's Subjects in some Parts of India. We thank Your Majesty for informing us that Instructions were issued to Your Majesty's Government in that Country to make the utmost Exertions to mitigate the Distress which prevailed during the Autumn of last Year; and we rejoice that the Blessing of an abundant Harvest has since that Time materially improved the Condition of the suffering Districts.

"WE have observed with deep Concern that the persevering Efforts and unscrupulous Assertions of treasonable Conspirators abroad have, during the last Autumn, excited the Hopes of some disaffected Persons in Ireland, and the Apprehensions of the loyal Population; but we learn with the greatest Satisfaction that the firm yet temperate Exercise of the Powers entrusted to the Executive, and the Hostility manifested against the Conspiracy by Men of all Classes and Creeds, have greatly tended to restore Public Confidence, and rendered hopeless any Attempt to disturb the general Tranquillity. With Your Majesty, we consequently trust that we may be enabled to dispense with the Continuance of any exceptional Legislation for that Part of Your Majesty's Dominions.

"WITH Your Majesty we join in acknowledging, with deep Thankfulness to Almighty God, the great Decrease which has taken place in the Cholera, and in the Pestilence which has attacked our Cattle; we regret that the continued Prevalence of the latter in some Foreign Countries, and its occasional Re-appearance in this, will still render necessary some special Measures of Precaution; but we trust that the Visitation of the former will add to increased Attention to those Sanitary Measures which Experience has shown to be its best Preventive.

"WE thank Your Majesty for informing us that, estimating as of the highest Importance an adequate Supply of pure and wholesome Water, Your Majesty has directed the Issue of a Commission to inquire into the best Means of permanently securing such a Supply for the Metropolis, and for the principal Towns in densely-peopled Districts of the Kingdom.

"WE convey to Your Majesty our humble Thanks for informing us, that our Attention will again be called to the State of the Representation of the People in Parliament; and, with Your Majesty, we trust that our Deliberations, conducted in a Spirit of Moderation and mutual Forbearance, may lead to the Adoption of Measures which, without unduly disturbing the Balance of Political Power, shall freely extend the Elective Franchise.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the frequent Occurrence of Disagreements between Employers of Labour and their Workmen, causing much private Suffering and public Loss, and occasionally leading, as is alleged, to Acts of Outrage and Violence, has induced Your Majesty to issue a Commission to inquire into and report upon the Organization of Trades Unions and other Associations, whether of Workmen or Employers, with Power to suggest any Improvement of the Law for their mutual Benefit. We assure Your Majesty that any Parliamentary Powers which may be necessary for making that Inquiry effective will be readily given by us.

"We convey to Your Majesty our humble Thanks for having directed Bills to be laid before us for the Extension of the beneficial Provisions of the Factory Acts to other Trades specially reported on by the Royal Commission on the Employment of Children, and for the better Regulation, according to the Principle of those Acts, of Workshops where Women and Children are largely employed.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Condition of the Mercantile Marine has attracted the serious Attention of Your Majesty, and that Measures will be submitted to us with a view to increase the Efficiency of that important Service.

"We learn with Satisfaction that Relaxations have been lately introduced into the Navigation Laws of France; that Your Majesty has expressed to The Emperor of the French Your Readiness to submit to Parliament a Proposal for the Extinction, on equitable Terms, of the Exemptions from local Charges on Shipping which are still enjoyed by a limited Number of Individuals in British Ports; and that His Imperial Majesty has, in anticipation of this Step, already admitted British Ships to the Advantage of the new Law. We will give our careful Attention to the Bill upon this Subject which Your Majesty has directed to be forthwith laid before us:

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we will give our most serious Consideration to the Bill which is to be submitted to us for making better Provision for the Arrangement of the Affairs of Railway Companies which are unable to meet their Engagements; as well as to any Measures for improving the Management of sick and other Poor in the Metropolis, and for a Re-distribution of some of the Charges for Relief therein.

"Our most careful Attention will be given to the Measures for the Amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, and the Consolidation of the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Admiralty; also to the Means of disposing, with greater Despatch and Frequency, of the increasing Business in the Superior Courts of Common Law and at the Assizes.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Relations between Landlord and Tenant in Ireland have engaged the anxious Attention of Your Majesty, and that a Bill will be laid before us, which, without interfering with the Rights of Property, will offer direct Encouragement to Occupiers of Land to improve their Holdings, and provide a simple Mode of obtaining Compensation for permanent Improvements.

"With Your Majesty, we pray that our Labours may, under the Blessing of Providence, conduce to the Prosperity of the Country and the Happiness of Your People."

LORD DELAMERE: My Lords, in rising to second this Address, I must venture, in the first place, to ask for your Lordships' indulgence, which I am satisfied was never yet refused. I have been some time a Member of your Lordships' House, but I have never before ventured to address you; and though I cannot say that I am a young Member in any sense of the word, I am sure that, whatever indulgence your Lordships would extend to the youngest Member of your House will not be withheld from me. I find myself in a position of no ordinary difficulty. I find myself like a man placed before an overwhelming feast who, with the best intentions, "hath not stomach for it all." The bill of fare is so large, that I can only venture to select a few dishes; or to speak more seriously, there are matters so various, so vast, and of such great and paramount importance contained in the Queen's Speech, that even if I were disposed to trespass on your Lordships' time at any length—which I am not—it would require more vast and varied knowledge than I have any claim to, to deal with them with that justice which many of the subjects command.

With regard to the first paragraph, intimating the existence of cordial relations with all foreign Powers, the assurance it conveys, although of the old stereotyped character, has, under present circumstances, far more than its usual significance, and will be received generally, I am sure, in a spirit of very deep and very earnest thankfulness. When we look back on the last year—when we consider the extraordinary number of events crowded within that brief space—how kingdoms have been overthrown, dynasties changed, battles waged and won, Europe dismembered and reconstructed, we can scarcely imagine that all these things, having taken place within so small a space—almost within a few weeks—should have yet assumed a character of such permanent durability as to promise to be lasting institutions, and afford a reasonable hope that the result of all these commotions would be to secure the peace of Europe. I fervently hope it may be so.

The next paragraph in the Speech deals with the questions pending between this country and the Government of the United States; and I am sure your Lordships will hear with satisfaction that it is likely that the differences which have existed between the two Governments may soon be amicably settled by arbitration. The noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs deserves great credit for the course he has taken on this subject. It requires more courage to pursue a course of conciliation, than one of irritation and resistance, and I hope the wisdom of such a course will be generally acknowledged, and that it will lay the foundation of lasting friendly relations between the two countries.

Your Lordships will be sorry to hear that the war between Spain and the Republics of Chile and Peru still continues; but your Lordships will be glad to hear that there is a fair prospect of bringing about improved relations between Turkey and its Cretan subjects. With respect to the proposed Confederation of the British Provinces in North America, I feel that the welfare and well-being of that country can only be considered as second to our own. The cheerfulness with which necessarily imposed self-sacrifices have been borne, the resolute attitude opposed to the Fenian insurrection, and the universal loyalty invariably displayed towards the British Crown, must always command our highest respect and consideration for the Canadian people, and render it a matter of pleasure as well as policy to draw as closely as possible the bonds of union between us. I am sure, also, that your Lordships will be glad to hear that Her Majesty's Government do not consider it necessary to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and that is one of the best evidences of the wisdom of the course which has been pursued by the Executive. We are all of us willing to bear testimony to the admirable mixture of firmness and conciliation which characterized the Administration of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), and I hope the noble Lord now at the head of affairs in Ireland (the Marquess of Abercorn) will prove himself no unworthy successor; and I trust that, without having to recur to stringent measures, we may see the end of this deplorable, but happily unsuccessful, attempt of a party of misguided men to subvert all lawful authority in Ireland. In connection with this I may allude to another topic in another part of the Speech, but which is so closely interwoven with it that one is in fact a continuance, if not an equal part and parcel of the other—I mean that alluding to the relations between Landlord and Tenant. There are two much-vexed questions always supposed to lie at the root of all Irish grievances—the Established Church, and the land system as applied in Ireland. The first of these we are not now called upon to discuss, but the other is a question of great importance, which concerns the whole country—the owner of land, the occupier of land, the Roman Catholic priest, and the Protestant clergyman. It affects every one, and there can be no doubt that it is a matter of very great difficulty and of very great importance. Some are of opinion that legislation is necessary; but others say that legislation would only be an interference between capital and labour, and that it must be left between the man who lets the land and the man who holds it; that it must be left to the natural course of things to be set right. I am sorry to say the natural course of things has been in operation for a considerable length of time, and it has not done much for it yet. I only mention this to show the value of what I trust will be the action of Parliament upon the subject. I am glad that Her Majesty's Government have taken the question in hand, and I trust it will be satisfactorily settled by a Government at the head of which is my noble Friend, himself an Irish proprietor; and I may be allowed to say before his face it is an additional qualification for settling the question that his whole life has been an unvarying testimony of his practical anxiety for the welfare of all whom Providence has placed under him. We do not want securities for men who have neither capital nor enterprise; but we do want security that the man who has both, and who spends both upon the land that he tills, should not be deprived of the fruits of his industry, or that the landlord should reap the whole of the advantages which his enterprise and industry have conferred upon the land. If Her Majesty's Government can do this, they will do more to settle the agitation in Ireland, and to restore peace and tranquillity to the country, than by the most stringent measure of coercion which it is possible to propose. Such measures are but the irritating, though alas necessary, remedies that attack the manifest symptoms of the disease; the other would go far towards laying the axe to the root of the evil itself.

My Lords, the next points to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention are the cases of the cholera and the cattle plague. I am happy to learn that the former disease appears to be expiring; but there are signs that the cattle plague may again break out. My Lords, I come from a part of the country which, unhappily, suffered considerably from its ravages, and I believe that our sad experience has left us so entirely in the dark as to any means of prevention or cure, that if it should unhappily break out again, there are no better means to stop its ravages than those that were before resorted to—that is, to stamp out the disease by slaughtering the animals that are infected. Then as to sanitary measures, nothing can be better than an adequate supply of pure and wholesome water, respecting which Her Majesty's Government announce they are about to issue a Commission of Inquiry especially with regard to the metropolis. If this can be effected, it will be the best preservative that can be devised against cholera. In addition to this, there are several other measures of administration which are proposed—a measure for making better provision for the arrangement of the affairs of railways, for improving the management of the sick and other poor in the metropolis, and also various legal reforms and improvements to which I have no doubt your Lordships' attention will in due time be called.

There are one or two other important subjects to which I wish to allude before I sit down. The first is the organization of capital and labour. I believe that legislation can do little in this matter except by laying down sound economical principles and protecting every man in the freedom of his own industry.

I must say this for the working men of the kingdom, my Lords, that I have always found them amenable to reason. I have had, in one way or another, a good deal to do with working men, and I have always found that they were open to reason. But, my Lords, I cannot say as much for the men who lead and guide them; men with ready tongues and mischievous brains, anxious at any price to secure their own momentary importance, and careless of the dangers and difficulties into which they are leading those who place only too implicit confidence in them. I am willing to admit that trades unions were, in their origin, perfectly legal, and might even in parts of their operation be beneficial. So long as the capitalists of this country were making large profits, it was reasonable that a portion of those profits should be transferred to labour, in order to ameliorate their condition and improve their wages. But, then, when profits had reached their minimum, when the trade of the country was in a state of collapse, is it reasonable that the rate of wages should still be insisted on being kept up to the same high standard? My Lords, I want the eyes of the working men to be opened to their own suicidal policy. They are killing the goose that laid the golden eggs. The trades unions may decide that the working man shall not take less than a given rate of wages; but they cannot compel the employer to give those wages.

But five-and-twenty cannot make him drink.”

It has been well said that capital is a coy nymph; and that if she be too roughly wooed she is apt to fly away. My Lords, are there not signs that she is preparing to fly away? Carpenters' work is now, to a large extent, imported from abroad; the frames of doors and windows are now prepared abroad and imported into this country. It is important, then, to consider what, under these circumstances, ought to be done. With respect to the state of trade at home, I can speak for myself. I have had a good deal of work done within the last two or three years; and last year I was told by a master builder, whom I employed, “My Lord, if I had this work to undertake again I would not make the same terms with your Lordship that I have done; I would charge one-third more in price, and I would not enter into any contract as to the time when it should be done.” How singular is the conduct of the London shipwrights. Think for a moment what that conduct is. The men have struck for 7s. a day; they refuse to work for 6s. 6d. a day; that is, for over £100 a year—a larger income than that which is enjoyed by many Government clerks and poor curates. But that is not all. They are willing, they say, to take 6s. 6d. a day, if an excuse can be made for them, and it can be made to appear that they are getting 7s. a day, because under no emergency is it to be supposed that their rate of wages is to be lowered. This, then, is the state of things. The men have refused 6s. 6d.; that is to say, they have refused an income of more than £100 a year. Their families are thrown upon the parish, and the wealthy are called upon to subscribe for them, and out of the charity of the people of England these destitute people are to be supported who have refused 6s. 5d. a day; and more than that, the parish rates will be raised on people who earn 5s. a day to compel them to support men who refuse to work for 6s. 6d. One thing more. The trades unions, when they go in for an increase of wages, promise an immediate gain to their members. Everybody can understand the advantage of an increase of wages. But when they go farther, when they interfere not only for the purpose of raising the rate of wages, but when they interfere with the freedom of labour of each other; when they insist that a man shall not be allowed to use those abilities which God has given him—that he shall not earn as much as he can by the labour of his hands for the support of his family, but insist on bringing all down to one low level, so that the skilful workman shall not do more than the most ignorant and idle—if this is to be allowed to take place, then, my Lords, I do not think I use too strong words when I say that it is absolute wickedness. One word more, my Lords, and I have done with the trades unions. In a speech delivered at Birmingham in 1860, the hon. Member for Birmingham says that—

“Working men have associations, trade societies, organizations, and I want to ask them why it is that all these various organizations throughout the country could not be made use of for the purpose of obtaining their political rights.”

Now, my Lords, after all that we have heard and seen of the way in which trades unions manage their own affairs—how carefully they treat the ticklish relations of capital and labour—with what caution and forethought they treat

the question of labour so as not to press too hardly upon the interests of the employers—how tender they are of the workman's wages—I ask, are they the people whom, in the event of their having a Reform Bill, with a considerable extension of the franchise—are they the people whom, in such an event, you would wish to see possessed of the larger portion of the political power of this country? A question has been raised whether there is to be a Reform Bill or not; but the question is now answered, and there is to be a Reform Bill. It must be admitted that the present time is unquestionably favourable for its consideration. There is fortunately no suffering in the country. The commercial panic has passed away. It has pleased God that there should be no disturbance at home or abroad, men's minds are full of the subject. The people of England have undoubtedly spoken their opinions very decidedly on the subject. It can no longer be said that there is no craving for Reform. There are large numbers of the working classes whom every man in England would be glad to see admitted to the franchise. I believe that if you were to poll all England, a very small percentage of the population would be found to say that it would be better to have no Reform. Another question is, what is the Reform Bill to be? and here there may be some difficulty about the matter. If the past has not decided what a Reform Bill should be, it has clearly pointed out that which it ought not to be; for it has been pretty well established that the country will not have a hasty and ill-considered and incomplete Reform Bill, nor one that will not set the question at rest for some time. These are the qualities that I hope to see developed; but, above all things, it must be such a Bill that while it shall not dispose altogether of the question, shall set it at rest for a considerable time. I think, if I may use such a phrase, that it is simple nonsense to be talking of finality in reference to Reform, you might as well talk of finality in reference to steam or gas; for in an age of progress such as this in which we live there cannot be such finality. What was sufficient for our fathers was not enough for us. What will satisfy us will probably not do for those who shall come after us. Whether it be a Liberal or a Conservative Government, if it is to stand, it cannot stand still; its progress must be upward and onward, and its motto must be Excelsior. The fact is that the progress of education and the spread of knowledge—and especially of the knowledge of political economy—has brought about this, that, whether for good or for evil, the people of this country will to a great extent govern themselves. The Government has not power to control this feeling, but it has the power of direction; and this power is that which must chiefly be exercised. The wheel will no doubt go round and the stream flow on, and the nation at large must move on with it. The object of a good Government must, under those circumstances, be to direct the wheel into the right groove, and to turn the stream into its proper channel, so that it shall be a fertilizing current instead of a devastating flood. A Reform Bill framed in that spirit will, I hope, be introduced by Her Majesty's Ministers; and a Bill so framed will, I have no doubt, recommend itself to the consideration of all classes of the people. When I mention all classes, I must except those who, under the name of Reform, would produce revolution, and who, instead of the adequate representation of all classes, would prefer to see established the dominant superiority of one class. I would say to such persons, "Show yourselves in your true colours; do you want a true representation of the varied feelings and interests of this country by honest, earnest men, convinced of the truth of the principles they advocate, or do you wish that the representative body of this kingdom should be reduced into a mere transcript of the popular feeling of the day, and, indeed, of the feeling of the most suffering, and, therefore, the most impressionable, part of the people of the kingdom?" In making these remarks, I must not be understood as contending that they furnish an argument against all Reform. On the contrary, there is no Member of your Lordships' House more sincerely convinced than I am of the absolute necessity of a considerable extension of the franchise as well as a re-distribution of seats. The considerations to which I refer were simply an argument in favour of great caution in dealing with our system of representation, as made up of parts which, although they may each of them be open to objection and capable of amendment, have yet worked well together, and made up a useful and harmonious whole. It is an argument in favour of a judicious, cautious, and temperate Reform; of a hesitation neither cowardly nor unwise over every footstep before it is definitively planted on that path where onward progress, be it to safety or to ruin, is fearfully easy—but return is impossible.

My Lords, I have now done; and I have only to thank your Lordships for the patience with which you have listened to me. But I will just add that the year that has passed has been one of suffering and of sorrow, owing to the prevalence of pestilence and other causes, yet during its course we have been spared the miseries of war; and I hope that, so far as we can judge, there is a better prospect before us for the future. And it is in accordance with this promise that the Government are about to propose what I think, without resorting to enthusiastic language, may be described as a very noble catalogue of measures which are likely to produce great good to the country; and it is now to the energy and sagacity of your Lordships' and of the other House of Parliament, and also to your courtesy and forbearance, that we must look for the hope of realizing a plentiful harvest from this "fair promise of the opening year." My Lords, in conclusion, I beg to second the Address which has just been moved by my noble Friend. [See Page 14.]

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I am happy to say with respect to the Address, which has been moved and seconded in a manner so fair and so temperate, that I can see no reason why we on this side of the House should offer to it any objection. But, with regard to the Speech from the Throne, I think it necessary to make a few observations. No one can complain either of the brevity of that Speech, or of want of variety in the topics with which it deals. I shall touch merely upon those points which I deem to be of the greatest interest and importance. The first which invites attention is the late war in Europe. In dealing with that question I would rather refer to a sentence which occurred in the Speech of Her Majesty at the end of last Session, than comment upon the very short paragraph in the Speech before us. At the close of last Session Her Majesty was pleased to declare—

"Her Majesty cannot have been an indifferent spectator of events which have seriously affected the positions of Sovereigns and Princes with whom Her Majesty is connected by the closest ties of relationship and friendship; but Her Majesty has not deemed it expedient to take part in a contest in which neither the honour of Her Crown nor the interest of Her people demanded any active intervention on Her part."

I entirely agree with that proposition. It appears to me to state fully and satisfactorily the reason why Her Majesty's Government did not interfere in the war between Prussia and Austria. In the Speech read, Her Majesty is made to say—

"I hope that the Termination of the War in which Prussia, Austria, and Italy have been engaged may lead to the Establishment of a durable Peace in Europe."

My Lords, we all hope the same; but although I, for one, sincerely hope that will be the case, this is a point on which, I am sorry to say, I am not sanguine. We cannot help seeing that ever since the aggression upon Denmark, two years ago, in opposition to all treaties and all faith hitherto observed with respect to treaties, a spirit of aggression has prevailed, or seemed to prevail, in Europe, especially in the case of one Power, which may in the future lead to great calamities. The subject is one, therefore, with regard to which it is impossible not to have some apprehension. I trust it will not be so, but it is impossible to ignore the possibility of such a catastrophe; still more, if we refer to rumours afloat on the subject. The next topic which is referred to in the Royal Speech is that with regard to the United States—

"I have suggested to the Government of the United States a Mode by which Questions pending between the Two Countries arising out of the late Civil War may receive amicable Solution, and which, if met, as I trust it will be, in a corresponding Spirit, will remove all Grounds of possible Misunderstanding, and promote Relations of cordial Friendship."

I believe it is not quite the usual and grammatical construction of a sentence to talk about meeting a mode; but with regard to the substance of the paragraph, I see no reason why, because I, when at the head of the Foreign Office, did not accept certain propositions which were made to me, the noble Lord now at the head of that Department should not come to a different conclusion. I, myself, in dealing with questions relating to America—as, for instance, in the case of the Bay Islands—took a course more in conformity with the views of the American Government than my predecessors in Office had deemed it their duty to pursue. The honour of the country is not, I assume, compromised in the proposal which the Government have made. Indeed, I should hear with extreme and painful surprise that the noble Earl opposite had consented to any solution of the question of which this could be asserted. I conclude that the papers on the subject will be laid before Parliament at the earliest possible period, so that we shall be informed very soon what proposition has been made, and whether it has been met in the spirit which the Government seem so confidently to predict. There are various topics in the Speech which I do not think it necessary to deal with now. They are measures of great importance, and I trust that when they are produced your Lordships will find that they will be such as will be conducive to the welfare of the country. Passing over, however, these topics for the present, I come at once to a subject on which the attention of the country is fixed—I mean the subject of Parliamentary Reform. Upon that question the Speech from the Throne tells us—

"Your Attention will again be called to the State of the Representation of the People in Parliament; and I trust that your Deliberations, conducted in a Spirit of Moderation and mutual Forbearance, may lead to the Adoption of Measures which, without unduly disturbing the Balance of political Power, shall freely extend the Elective Franchise."

I may, I hope, conclude from this paragraph—which is somewhat mysteriously worded—that a Bill will very soon be introduced into the other House of Parliament dealing with Reform; and that it will contain provisions so fair and satisfactory that that House may be able to meet and consider it in a liberal spirit, and to give it its support. Having paid a good deal of attention to this subject, and having been much connected with it, I must request your Lordships to allow me to state how it has arrived at the not very satisfactory position in which it at present stands. There was, unfortunately, incorporated with the Reform Act—against the wishes of its framers—a clause called the Chandos Clause, which introduced into the electoral body in the counties a set of persons who, I should say, were about the most dependent class existing in the country—namely, the £50 tenants-at-will. It was urged against the proposal that those tenants would be sure to vote in a particular way; that they were, in fact, so dependent upon their landlords that they would vote as they were bidden. However, the House accepted the clause, and the Government of Lord Grey did not think it wise to interfere with its decision. The consequence was that the Act, which might otherwise have settled the question of Reform for fifty years, subsequently became the subject of discussion in the House of Commons. It was then proposed, by an hon. Member of great respectability, to reduce the county occupation franchise from £50 to £10, and the House agreed to the second reading of a Bill brought in for that purpose fifteen years ago. But it was then thought that if changes were to be made in the Reform Act, there were other classes of persons who also ought to have the elective franchise, and that their admission to it would strengthen the Constitution, would give additional force to what may be called the garrison of the Constitution, and enable a large class of deserving men in boroughs, renting houses somewhat under £10, to take a greater interest in political affairs. These deserving persons comprised the well-doing artisans in the towns of this country; and it was therefore proposed that they should be admitted along with occupiers at a lower rent than £50 in counties. This last proposal was strongly opposed. It was said, "You must not degrade the franchise." That was the phrase constantly used. Accordingly, when the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) was in power in 1859, it was declared that the extension of the franchise must be only in a lateral direction—that no proposal for lowering of the suffrage in towns could be admitted or listened to. That, as I conceived, was a very great defect in the measure of the noble Earl, excluding, as it did, by a new Reform Bill, every man, however deserving, whose rent happened to be under £10 from the franchise. That Bill had also another defect—it would have tended to restore nomination boroughs, for it was quite clear that by certain provisions of it landowners living 200 miles off would be enabled to go and vote, and thus swamp the inhabitants of the borough. I thought, therefore, that it was my duty to endeavour to persuade the House to reject the Bill. The House of Commons listened to me, and passed a Resolution which the Government were obliged either to accept or else they were bound to give up their Bill. The Government gave up their measure and dissolved Parliament. It is true that they afterwards intimated that they thought the borough franchise might be lowered, but that was only when a Motion of Want of Confidence in them was brought forward by the Marquess of Hartington. Since then the lowering of the franchise has been constantly opposed; and before the elections in 1865, it was declared by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) that, most happily, the House of Commons had refused to "degrade" the suffrage. That, however, was not the real question, but whether the artisans of this country, the best of them living in houses somewhat under £10, should, or should not, have the power of voting for Members of Parliament. I made a variety of proposals upon that subject, but they were all to the same effect. There was not one of those which I do not still consider to be a good proposition, though some may have been better than others; but the party now in power constantly and openly opposed them all. Then, my Lords, what happened last Session? The Government of that day thought it right again to introduce a measure on that question; and I think your Lordships will see that the proposition to admit to the franchise in counties tenants at a value somewhat under £50, and in towns a number of artisans occupying houses at a value somewhat under £10, need not have frightened anybody, especially as a very similar proposal had been carried into effect with your Lordships' consent in respect to Ireland, where the occupation franchise is now fixed by Act of Parliament at £12 in counties and £8 in boroughs. By our Bill of last year we proposed an occupation franchise of £14 in counties and £7 in boroughs. It might at least have been dispassionately considered, but how was it met? Our proposals were met in a manner which I have always considered was neither honourable to those concerned, nor safe for the country; for it has been the cause of what the noble Lord the Seconder of the Address complained of, when he said that there were persons who, as he stated, were misleading the artisan classes. The noble Earl opposite thought it necessary last year to make a declaration as to the course which he should pursue with regard to our Bill. I have referred to the speech made by the noble Earl, in which he found fault with my conduct in regard to his Bill of 1859. The noble Earl said—

"How that Bill was encountered, defeated, and got rid of, perhaps the noble Earl has now forgotten. I can assure him I have not."—[3 Hansard, cxxx. 100.]

Then, going on to make a declaration of the course which he should himself pursue with respect to any measure introduced by the then Government, on February 6, 1866, the noble Earl proceeded as follows:—

"I will express no opinion upon their measure until I have seen it. I hope it will be such a measure as I shall be able to support, that it will be a reasonable and satisfactory settlement of this great and important question, which I believe it is desirable to settle, and settle once for all. And I promise the noble Earl another thing—that his Bill shall have fair play; that it shall not be thrust aside by any underhand methods; that there shall be no factious movements or combinations against it on the part of those who can combine for nothing else; that it shall be dealt with on its merits; that if we can approve it we shall give it our cordial support; but that, on the other hand, if we disapprove it and think it is imperfect, inadequate, or dangerous, and, above all, if we think it one leading to future agitation within a brief period of a perilous character, then with whatever means we may possess we shall do our best to throw it out by fair debate and honourable opposition."—[8 Hansard, clxxxi. 101.]

My Lords, it is my privilege to give my opinion on this matter, and I must say I think our Bill did not have "fair play;" that it was encountered by "underhand methods" and by "factious movements and combinations on the part of those who could combine for nothing else;" that it was not "dealt with upon its merits;" and that it was not met by "fair debate and honourable opposition." That, my Lords, is a statement of my opinion. It is hardly necessary that I should now trace the career of that Bill through the House of Commons, but I may state what I hold to be a fair opposition. Our plan for reforming the county occupation franchise was by placing it at £14. It was proposed, on the other hand, that £20 should be the limit fixed. That was, I think, a fair mode of meeting the Bill, and an honourable way of dealing with the question; and if it had been adopted by the House of Commons, it would have formed a basis for the county franchise. Now, let me state what I regard as a course of quite a different character. It was said that a Bill proposing in the first place to deal with the franchise in England, similar to one which had been passed in the case of Ireland, was not sufficient. It was proposed that the measures for the re-distribution of seats should be dealt with in the same Bill as the franchise; and that proposal was supported, not by those who wished to see a great and complete measure of Reform, but by those who were opposed to any change in the present system, and who thought it would be inconsistent with the public interests to have any Reform at all. That proposal was defeated; but it was afterwards agreed by the Government that the Re-distribution Bill should be grafted upon the Bill for extending the franchise. Again, when we submitted our measure providing for the re-distribution of the seats, it was sought to graft upon that the further proposal that the part of the Bill dealing with the re-distribution of the seats should be taken first and disposed of before proceeding with the other part of the question. Now, if your Lordships will consider that in 1832 the question of the simple re-distribution of seats occupied from the beginning of July till the end of September, and that our draft Bill contained, not only proposals for taking away Members from certain boroughs, but also for grouping different towns together with a view, if possible, to prevent bribery and corruption, you will at once perceive the inevitable result. Had the House of Commons decided upon proceeding with that portion of the measure first, there would have been such lengthened controversies every day, not only upon the different places that were to be grouped, but also as to one borough being ten miles distant and another not more than eight, and the like minutiae, that it would have taken probably from the beginning of July to the end of September to get through Committee, and it would then have been quite impossible before the close of the Session to have had any discussion on the real question—namely, whether a £6, a £7, or an £8 rating, or any other franchise, should be adopted for boroughs. That was the way in which the then Opposition evaded dealing with the Bill of the late Government on its merits. They endeavoured to defeat it by underhand proceedings, and by a proposal contrary to the rules of the House of Commons, and the practice of honourable opposition. It was contrary to the regulation that all parties have adopted for many years, that of giving notice of any important Amendment, and placing it on the Votes in a printed form, so that those who have to meet it should know what that Motion is. That step was taken without any such notice, and without any knowledge on the part of the Government that any Motion was about to be made. The Government were not aware of the Amendment till within five or ten minutes before it was moved, and they had come down prepared to deal with a Motion of which notice had been given in the regular way. That was the course adopted by the Opposition. I call that an unfair and underhand course. I say that, with regard to the Bill of the late Government it was not met on its merits, but an attempt was made to form a combination against it on the part of those who were unable to combine on any other subject. If I am well-founded in my history of what then took place, the noble Earl opposite has no occasion to "thank God that he was not as other men," nor even as those Publicans of 1859, because he was quite as bad as those Publicans. With respect to the Bill which the noble Earl is about to produce, I only hope that it will be produced soon; that it will contain such provisions that it may receive the support of the House of Commons and of your Lordships. For my own part, I neither promise to support it nor do I threaten opposition to it. If it be a good Bill, no doubt we shall be happy to see it carried. If it be a bad Bill, with an incomplete or delusive franchise, it would only lead to that to which the noble Earl last year justly objected. If we think it will lead on a future occasion to agitation of a perilous character, it will be our duty to oppose it. If the House of Commons pass a fair Bill, and your Lordships approve it, giving a great body of the artisans of this country the privileges which they are well fitted to exercise—if we impose upon them the duty which they are well fitted to perform, that of exercising one of the most important functions which can be exercised in a free country in voting for representatives to Parliament; in short, in selecting men on whom the conduct, power, faith, and freedom of this country depend for many years—if you give them that advantage freely and fairly, and to a proper extent, then you may hope to settle this question. But if, on the other hand, you endeavour by any tricks or shuffles to cheat them of that fair right, and endeavour to give them less than that to which they are entitled, you will not succeed, and you will lay the foundation of future agitation. I am aware that many of the public meetings have declared in favour of manhood suffrage, but hardly any one in either House of Parliament wishes for such a suffrage, and if you give the working classes of this country a fair proportion of votes you may hope to settle this question for a considerable time. But if you deal with it unfairly and inadequately there can be no better theme for agitation at the General Election, which must take place soon after the passing of such a Bill, than that the present House of Commons cheated the country, and that it was necessary to have a new Reform Bill and new Members of Parliament who would do their duty to their constituents more honestly than the Members of the present House of Commons. If I were an agitator I would wish for no better theme. The noble Earl having arrived at the conclusion that there ought to be a large Reform, will, I trust, reduce the franchise to such an extent that his measure will be accepted by the country. We all know very well that there are different methods of reasoning which affect different minds. Some people are very well convinced by the inductive method; others are more convinced by the method of deduction. Some like the algebraic, and others the geometric method. But with regard to noble Lords opposite there is no way which succeeds so well as being in Office. The noble Earl, in a speech delivered by him at Liverpool in the course of the summer, dwelt upon the great advantage arising from a change of Government from time to time. I quite agree with him in what he said; but there is a further advantage which he did not mention—namely, that when the noble Earl comes into Office he perceives the truth of propositions which he has been opposing for fifteen years. I have only further to say that I trust the measure which the Government have announced with respect to Ireland will have all the merits which ought to belong to our legislation on this subject—that it will have no injurious effects on the rights of property, but that it will enable tenants to make improvements. If the noble Earl secures those objects he will confer a great advantage upon Ireland. The last time the noble Earl was in Office he was particularly fortunate in the selection of his Lord Lieutenant. Lord Eglinton performed the duties of Lord Lieutenant in a manner which won the respect and admiration of all parties in Ireland and in this country. I believe that he has been equally fortunate in the selection of the present Lord Lieutenant, who has conducted himself in a manner to which no one can object. Of course, the duties of a Lord Lieutenant are those of Administration solely. As the late Lord Wellesley said, the duty of the Lord Lieutenant is to administer the law and not to alter it. There are other questions of importance affecting Ireland—among them that of landlord and tenant—which, when we have got rid of Reform, will deserve the attention of your Lordships as much as any question can. My noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley), when he was Lord Lieutenant, made many valuable suggestions in regard to Ireland. But nothing can be undertaken on the subject of Ireland without the deepest consideration. The best intentions are not enough, but I do trust that measures for the amelioration of the condition of Ireland will be considered with deliberation and will be carried. I thank your Lordships for your attention, and have only to add that I do not consider it necessary to move any Amendment to the Address.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I trust that, in addressing your Lordships, I may be permitted to express my gratitude to my noble Friends behind me for the very succinct, clear, and able manner in which they moved and seconded the Address. I should hardly have thought it possible to go through the varied topics of a Speech from the Throne with so much clearness, discretion, and brevity as was done by my noble Friend who moved the Address. There was not a single topic of the Speech which he left untouched, and not one which he did not touch upon with the most perfect fairness and discretion. I must also express my satisfaction that the noble Earl who has just sat down has not found any matter for comment—certainly not for objection—in the Speech from the Throne. I am more satisfied with the course which the noble Earl has found it expedient to pursue than even with his assurance that he does not intend to move an Amendment to the Address. In his somewhat lengthened discourse the noble Earl—with the exception of one important topic—has not commented on the Speech, but has thought it necessary to enter into an historical discussion as to the progress or non-progress of Reform for the last five-and-thirty years, and concerning the various Bills, and discussions, and disputes which have taken place. My Lords, I may say, at the outset, that I must decline to follow the noble Earl into that part of his speech. It is our earnest desire and hope that this great question of Parliamentary Reform may meet with an early and satisfactory settlement. Her Majesty's Ministers having announced their intention of bringing forward the question at a very early period, I may at once relieve the noble Earl's anxiety as to any attempt at delay upon our part by saying that upon the very earliest possible day—

Earl Russell

I believe on Monday next—it is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to lay before the House of Commons in detail the proposal which Her Majesty's Government intend to bring forward. But, my Lords, I am compelled to say that there is no hope of a satisfactory settlement of such a question if it be taken up in the spirit and in the temper which I am sorry to say the noble Earl has manifested. If it be the intention to meet this question, not with the view of considering what is best to be done, but by bandying recriminations with the opposite party, and with charging them with unfairness, inconsistency, and double dealing, and what not, and by carrying the recrimination backwards to a period of fifteen years or more, then I say, my Lords, there is no hope of this question arriving at a satisfactory settlement. In that case I should deeply regret the course which Her Majesty's Government have been induced to pursue in raising a question which can only lead to angry discussions without any probability of a satisfactory result. My Lords, we do desire to see this question satisfactorily settled. If, however, we desire to see the representation of the country placed upon a sound basis—if we desire to see a settlement of the question, which I do not say should be final, but which shall render unnecessary and improbable any agitation with regard to further measures for a very considerable time, then I say that such an object cannot be attained by making the question one of party and of political strife for the purpose of obtaining Office or Parliamentary majorities. The subject must be examined in a fair, deliberate, and dispassionate spirit. We must be prepared to give and take—we must be prepared to meet each other's views—we must be prepared, above all things, to cast away all questions of party and all questions of strife and political power. [Laughter.] Noble Lords laugh; but I say this, and I am speaking from the deepest conviction in my own mind, that there is no possible Government in this country that could, at the present moment, by itself carry a Reform Bill. The noble Earl tried it last year, when he thought he had a majority. He laid down the broad principle, that no Government was required or justified in bringing forward a Reform Bill unless they thought they had a reasonable prospect of being able to carry it. I do not go quite so far as the noble Earl ; but I say that in the present state of parties no Government—be it on this side of the House or be it on that side of the House—can hope to carry by their own separate and distinct exertions such a Reform Bill as they might think the most desirable. If this question is to be settled it must be settled by mutual compromise, and by mutual forbearance, and not by bandying recriminations and reproaches upon past discussions and past differences. Although I cannot commend the accuracy of the noble Earl's recapitulation of what took place either in 1859 or 1866, I will not follow him into the topic. I will not argue with him as to the statement which the noble Earl made that from the period extending from 1832 down to 1866 the desire and attempt of the Conservative party was to keep the borough franchise from being reduced below £10, and to keep the county franchise from being reduced below £50. I may, however, say that, with regard to the county franchise, it is notorious that in 1859 the then Government proposed a larger reduction of the county franchise and a greater extension than has been proposed since that period. But the sense of the House, of the public, and of the country was pronounced against the proposal. It was, I think, a matter open to argument, that the county and borough franchise should stand upon the same footing ; and it was in accordance with this view that when we proposed largely to reduce the county franchise we declined to reduce the borough franchise, so that we might maintain an equality betwixt the two. That proposal, however, was not sanctioned by the country or Parliament, and has never been introduced since, it having been generally admitted that there should be a difference with regard to the amount and character of the qualification of the counties and boroughs. From that time the noble Earl certainly has not given us many opportunities of expressing our opinion upon the subject. Since 1860 down to 1866 he was perfectly satisfied to leave the whole question of the franchise and Reform alone ; and it was not till last year that his newly awakened zeal for the benefit of the artisans and the working classes led him to bring forward a hasty, imperfect, and crude proposition. How the Bill was defeated is matter of history. It was not defeated solely by the political opponents of the noble Earl, but by many of those who, being his supporters, felt the measure was so ill-considered, so incomplete, so unsatisfactory, and at the same time so dangerous, that, although the House of Commons had unanimously assented to the principle of a Bill extensively lowering the franchise, and introducing material changes, yet, when they came to discuss the details of the measure, they felt they could not give it their support. It was not, therefore, by the opposition mainly of the opponents of the then Government, but practically by the opposition of those who were generally supporters of the Government, and Members of the Liberal party, that that Bill was pronounced to be one to which the House of Commons could not give its sanction. I beg your Lordships' pardon for having been led into taking so much notice of the topics that have been introduced by the noble Earl. I will not say a word further about the measure which Her Majesty's Government are to bring in, but that this question should be left for discussion until the time when it is fairly brought before the House. I think that this question cannot be brought forward in a satisfactory manner upon such an occasion as the discussion of the Address to the Crown ; but that when it is brought forward it should be laid before the House in such a manner as will fully and clearly set forth the reasons for the course which it is intended to pursue, and will give the House, which is principally, though not exclusively, interested in its settlement, a full opportunity of passing their judgment upon the measure recommended by Her Majesty's Ministers. Passing from this subject, there are only one or two further topics contained in the speech of the noble Earl to which I can advert. In the first place, he expressed a hope that in any proposition that might be made by the United States Government for the settlement of those unfortunate differences which have arisen out of the late Civil War, the present Government may do nothing which may sacrifice or imperil the honour of this country. He did not complain that Her Majesty's present Government had taken a different course from that which he had thought fit to pursue ; but he hoped we should make no concessions calculated to sacrifice the honour of the country. My Lords, although certain negotiations have taken place, the correspondence has not yet arrived at the point at which I should think it consistent with my duty to lay it before the House ; but I may venture to say that in that correspondence whenever it shall be laid before your Lordships—and it shall be laid on the table at as early a period as the public service will allow—the noble Earl will find that while Her Majesty's Government are disposed to come to an amicable solution of the matter if they are capable, they will in no degree depart from that which is due to the honour of the country, or forfeit any of those rights which properly belong to independent nations. The noble Earl has stated that he believes some proposition has been made to the Government of the United States. The fact is this:—Shortly after the accession to Office of the present Government the United States Government addressed a despatch to the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office recapitulating the grounds of complaint which they stated they had against the British Government. In point of fact, these were the same as those which had been before pressed upon the noble Earl. In answer to the despatch my noble Relative thought it necessary to enter, not acrimoniously but particularly, into a discussion of the various points which the United States Government presented for adjustment and compensation. I may say that there was one question which pressed upon my mind, as it had on the mind of the noble Earl opposite, and upon which we found it impossible to come to any compromise, and that was the question of the right of this country to decide at what time, and under what circumstances, it should recognise belligerent rights. •With regard to this point, I think the answer which the noble Earl formerly gave was entirely conclusive—namely, that in the first place the question of the discretion to recognise belligerent rights was inherent in an independent country; and in the next place, that in this particular instance the recognition of belligerent rights did not precede but followed the declaration of blockade on the part of the United States Government. Blockade is essentially an exercise of belligerent rights; and after the blockade had been declared by one of the belligerents, there were but two courses for the Government of this country to pursue—namely, to refuse to recognise the validity of the blockade on the ground that there were no belligerents, or to recognise the belligerent rights of both parties. Between these two alternatives the late Government selected that which the noble Earl truly said was most friendly to the United States—namely, they recognised the very imperfect blockade. At the same time, they found themselves under the necessity of recognising correlative obligations. I cannot but think that this is a point which the United States Government will not, upon reflection, think it necessary or expedient to press, and for this reason:—We saw lately, I think it was upon the introduction of the new French Minister from Washington, that a declaration was officially made to the effect that after the evacuation of Mexico by the French troops there would no longer remain between the two countries a single question which could lead to a ground of difference, or be made the subject of complaint; and thus nothing would remain to interfere with the cordial relations which the United States always desire to keep up with France. Now, with regard to the recognition of belligerent rights, Her Majesty's late Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French proceeded in concert, acting simultaneously, and pursuing a precisely identical course; and even if I attributed to the United States Government a feeling of unfriendliness towards this country—which I am very far from doing—they could not denounce as a reasonable ground for complaint, compensation, and remonstrance against this country that which they have officially declared to be no obstacle between friendly nations on the part of the Government of France, whose action was simultaneous and identical with that of this country. But we have said this—if the Government of the United States will state the principle upon which the arbitration is to proceed; if they will point out the precise question which they wish to have referred to arbitration, and the grounds on which they ask for redress and compensation, we, on our parts, shall be quite ready to meet them in a friendly spirit for the purpose of discussing the particular questions on which the arbitration is sought; and if we can find an impartial arbitrator, we shall be prepared to submit those questions to his judgment. These are, in substance, the proposals we have made to the United States Government. It remains to be seen whether negotiations founded on those principles can be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. I hope and trust that they may; because I am convinced that there are no countries whose interests are more deeply involved in the maintenance of friendly relations with one another then this country and the great Republic on the other side of the Atlantic. I believe that nothing could be more suicidal than a war between England and the United States; and that no other countries in the world could either inflict upon each other so large an amount of injury, or be productive to each other of so many benefits. There is, I think, only one other point in Her Majesty's Speech to which the noble Earl adverted, and that is the measure which we propose to introduce for the settlement of the relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland. I do not at all wish to detract from the merits which the noble Earl ascribed—and very properly ascribed—to the Administration of the late Lord Lieutenant of that country; and I agree with the noble Earl that one of the Irish questions most necessary to be solved, and at the same time perhaps most difficult of solution, is that question of the relation between landlord and tenant. I will not, however, anticipate the discussion of that particular measure which we propose to bring forward. The Bill upon the subject is prepared, and is ready to be laid upon the table of the other House; and I will only say that in preparing that Bill Her Majesty's Government were anxiously desirous of giving, on the one hand, every facility to tenants for improving their holdings and for benefiting themselves by those improvements, and, on the other hand, of maintaining those just rights of property on the part of landlords which cannot be interfered with without destroying the whole social condition of this country. As the noble Earl did not think it necessary to comment on any other portion of Her Majesty's Speech, and as, after waiting for a little time, I did not find that any other noble Lord was desirous of addressing your Lordships, I will not touch any further upon the various topics to which the Speech refers; but I will content myself with expressing my thankfulness to your Lordships for the manner in which you have received the Speech and the Address, and I hope that the temperate spirit which has been displayed upon this occasion, furnishes a just indication of the courtesy and the candour with which the measures that may be submitted to your Lordships will be received during the remainder of the Session.

Address agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente, and Ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That this House has, this day, attended Her Majesty in the House of Peers, when Her Majesty was pleased to make, by Her Chancellor, a most gracious Speech from the Throne to both Houses of Parliament; of which, Mr. Speaker said, he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a Copy:—

And Mr. SPEAKER read it to the House.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

MR. DE GREY rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in answer to Her most gracious Speech. He said, he could not but feel that if, under ordinary circumstances, no Member unused to take part in the debates of this House could venture to rise without asking the indulgence of the House, still more must he, one of the youngest of its Members, claim that consideration which was always so generously bestowed on those who undertook the duty. But there were special circumstances which required that he should use peculiar caution in addressing them. In the last Session a great struggle took place, which terminated in a change of Ministry. It could hardly be said that the House had settled down into that regular division of parties which it usually presented; and if he should be so unfortunate as to say anything which might be distasteful to any section of the House, or to any Member of it, in commenting upon the various questions which arose out of Her Most Gracious Majesty's Speech, he trusted it would be attributed solely to his want of practice and experience. Though this House might be more than usually divided in its opinions, he thought he should not be wrong if he ventured to express his belief that there was in it such an amount of fairness and independence that we might expect that good measures would receive a large amount of support from whichever side they might emanate, and that Her Majesty's Government would be met with that fair dealing which the circumstances under which they had taken Office (and he trusted with confidence the measures they would propose) would be acknowledged to have entitled them to. He would not pursue this train of thought further. There was much in the Speech of Her Majesty, whose most gracious presence at the opening of the Session had been a source of heartfelt gratification to them, in common with all Her loyal subjects—there was much in that Speech which was the subject of congratulation, and nothing more so than the fact that she was able to inform them that friendly relations subsist with all foreign Powers, from which assurance we might fairly infer that we should continue to enjoy the blessings of peace. The policy of Great Britain was assuredly a policy of peace. If there was one thing that distinguished this country from many others it was that she had long ceased to have any ambitious desire for territorial aggrandizement. Her flourishing trade at home and abroad, the enormous development of her manufacturing industry, and her sense of the obligations of justice, humanity, and religion, all led to a strong desire on the part of every class for the maintenance of peace. With this object they were commonly told that they must avoid interference with the affairs of other countries; but, however much they might desire to act upon this policy, they could not altogether separate themselves from the great community of nations which everywhere surrounded them and their possessions. The tendency of railways and other modern improvements was to bring them more into contact with foreign Governments and peoples; and it was hardly to be hoped, except under a reign of universal peace (which, at present at least, appeared to be far distant) that they could preserve intimate relations with other Powers, without questions arising which might cause disputes and even force hostilities upon them. With a view to such contingencies this country must reserve to herself the right and power of defending her own dignity and honour whensoever and by whomsoever they may be attacked. To do this effectually she must necessarily keep up the efficiency of her fleets and armies, and strengthen them by all those modern appliances which had recently proved so formidable and effective, and had wholly altered the nature and operations of modern warfare. And they must not neglect to use every effort for ameliorating the condition and securing the increased comforts of their soldiery. The improved condition of all classes led to an earnest desire that the army should participate in these advantages. The necessity also of providing an efficient army of reserve must not be overlooked. They were, therefore, fully prepared for the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech which called upon them to sanction some necessary expenditure for this purpose; and he felt confident that the House would not be backward in providing the means for meeting Her Majesty's wishes, at the same time that they heartily thanked Her Majesty for the gracious announcement that the Estimates had been prepared with every regard for combining efficiency and economy. The year 1866 had witnessed a great change in the map of Europe; with the events by which that change had been effected hon. Members must necessarily be familiar, for the circumstances which attended it were followed by every one in this country with the deepest interest. Strongly as he might feel as to the conduct of those who were engaged in that short but sanguinary and decisive struggle, he should be unwilling to provoke a discussion or to rake up those differences of opinion which no doubt existed upon this question. But, fully admitting the expediency of avoiding, as far as possible, intervention in the affairs of other nations, he could not but feel a misgiving as to whether this country might not have acted with more firmness at a much earlier period, and used her influence successfully for the prevention of injustice and wrong. But, whatever their private and personal feelings might be, they could not but concur with Her Majesty in the hope that the establishment of a strong ruling Power in Germany would prevent any renewal of hostilities, and lead to a long and lasting peace in Europe. Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to announce that she had suggested to the Government of the United States a mode by which questions arising out of the late Civil War in America may receive an amicable solution. This subject had long occupied the attention of, and entailed a lengthened correspondence between, England and the United States of America. It was a question which, perhaps, admitted of some doubt whether the occurrences which led to this correspondence amounted to a breach of the Neutrality Laws; but much ill-feeling had been created, and it was not unnatural that the American people should feel strongly upon the subject. It was therefore to be hoped that the suggestion of Her Majesty's Government would be generously accepted by the American Government in the same spirit in which it had been made, and eventually lead to such an arrangement as would bring about a thorough mutual good understanding, and, if necessary, such an alteration of the Neutrality Laws as would clear up all doubts and prevent any such differences arising for the future. Upon the next paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech, relating to the war between Spain and the South American Republics, it was not his intention to comment at any length. The wanton destruction of property of a private nature in the bombardment of maritime towns, even in warfare, was an act contrary to all the principles of modern civilization, and it was not unsatisfactory to know that in this instance this was not done with impunity. Though the offers of mediation made by Her Majesty's Government in the hope of restoring peace to these distant countries had not been accepted, it was much to be hoped, in the interests of humanity, that all questions which had unhappily arisen between these descendants of a common origin might speedily

'be settled under the auspices of a friendly Power. It was gratifying to learn that the efforts of Her Majesty and her allies had been directed to bringing about such improved relations between the Porte and its Christian subjects as were not inconsistent with the sovereign rights of the Sultan. As a Christian nation they could not but feel sympathy with all Christians who lived under Turkish rule; but it was satisfactory to find that Her Majesty had not found it necessary to exercise any active interference in those internal disturbances which had prevailed in some provinces of the Turkish Empire, and broken out in actual insurrection in Crete; and it was to be hoped that Her Majesty would now be able to promote with effect those benevolent objects that her efforts had been directed, in conjunction with her allies the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Russia, to insure. Her Majesty also announced that she had acknowledged Prince Charles of Hohenzollern, who had been chosen by the inhabitants of the Danubian Principalities as their ruler; and it was to be hoped that his accession would lead to a firm union of those provinces, and be followed by that prosperity which was the natural consequence and, at the same time, the surest test of good government. Her Majesty further informed them that she had commanded a Bill to be submitted to Parliament for the Confederation of the British North American Provinces. At no period during the history of this country had the relations between the respective provinces and the Home Government been in a more satisfactory condition than they were at present. At no time had there been a more cordial feeling existing between them and the mother country. They had seen how willingly the Canadians had undertaken the organization of Volunteer forces and the training of militia, and freely disbursed the funds necessary for the defence of our mutual interests. England could not but reciprocate this feeling; and the noble manner in which the inhabitants of these provinces had come forward to defend themselves, and their connection with this country, must make every Englishman feel a desire that we should do our part to confirm and ratify a scheme of Confederation which had received the sanction of the authorities and the great majority of the people of these countries. It was understood that at present certain provinces had not joined in the plan of Confederation; but if, as it seemed the Government had reason to believe, the proposed Confederation, so far as it was intended to be carried out, was the real desire of the people, and was likely to strengthen them against possible enemies, it must be wise that we should give a willing assent to their wishes, and rejoice to see a United Canada arise in the place of the now separate, but not unfriendly, provinces. One of those dreadful famines which seemed to occur periodically in India had, during the past year, attacked part of the Bengal and Madras Presidencies. Great difficulty appeared to have been experienced in conveying the necessary relief to the suffering districts, and had not an abundant harvest, under the blessing of Providence, helped to allay the sufferings which at one time carried off thousands every week, it was impossible to calculate what might have been the extent of those lamentable consequences which neither the liberal flow of private charity, which was always so readily forthcoming, nor the action of a sympathizing Government which the emergency called forth could ever have been sufficient to avert. There is no doubt an ample opening in India for those great public works and improvements which were calculated to develop the resources of an Empire; and when communication was better established by means of railways or canals the food produced in one part of the country, which might not, perhaps, be affected by the destructive causes operating upon another, would more easily be conveyed to the point where the necessity for it occurred, and relief would thus be more immediately afforded. Nor did it seem that the primary cause was entirely beyond the control of human foresight. In a country like India, whose rivers and streams were numerous, where in seasons of unusual drought in many vast districts the produce of cultivation was entirely destroyed, or cultivation itself rendered impossible, much might surely be done by means of irrigation, and a judicious expenditure begun in time might secure the inhabitants of those districts in a great measure from the recurrence of similar calamities. Parliament must heartily rejoice with Her Majesty that it was no longer necessary for the safety of her subjects in Ireland to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. They must be thankful to feel that the attempt at insurrection there had been successfully quelled and kept under control by the firmness with which it was met, tempered as that firmness was by the liberal mercy of the Government, and that without a single outbreak, or the shedding, he was glad to say, of one drop of Irish blood, showing that when a Government were determined upon a decisive course of action which they felt to be the best and surest means of putting a stop to threats of rebellion, offenders against the law would rarely venture to come to a direct issue with them, and that there was little real danger to the security of life and property which it was the first duty of every Government to maintain. But, while we congratulated ourselves on the result of the firmness and decision of those whose primary duty it was to determine the course of action to be pursued, we must not forget to give due credit to those on whom was thrown the arduous and delicate duty of carrying out the policy of the Government. In these days, when the liberty of commenting on the conduct of public servants was so freely indulged in, their responsibility was enormously increased, and it was satisfactory to feel that in this case the conduct of those who were engaged had met with approval from all parties. One of the most gratifying circumstances attending the past crisis was the fact, so graciously announced by Her Majesty, of the hostility manifested by all classes and creeds to the authors of these disturbances. Indeed, the stand taken against Fenianism by the large body of influential Roman Catholics, headed by their clergy, must have proved of the greatest assistance and support to Her Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances, it was not unnatural that the Government should have been anxious to consider whether anything could be done to mitigate the feeling of discontent which too frequently, and most unhappily for its prosperity, prevailed in that portion of Her Majesty's dominions. Among the questions which appeared to cause that discontent, one in particular arose out of the relations of landlord and tenant, and when we were told that a measure was in contemplation for securing to tenants compensation for farm improvements, we might, perhaps, look upon the announcement as a graceful tribute to the loyalty and good feeling which had actuated so large a portion of the population of Ireland. To us in England it appeared almost difficult to imagine that there should be a necessity for any special legislation on this point. Our tenancies were subject to certain conditions, to which both parties agreed in the first instance; in the absence of previous agreement the custom of the country intervened to regulate those conditions; and all that the law had to do was to secure that the conditions agreed upon, or established by the custom of the country, should be carried out. But the circumstances of Ireland were exceptional; and he was far from saying that improvements in that respect might not be introduced with advantage provided they were framed with a due regard to the rights of property which never could be ignored in Ireland or in any other country. He believed it might be stated, without fear of contradiction, that Ireland was improving rapidly in prosperity and wealth. It was said that her cattle had increased 50 per cent and her sheep 100 per cent in twenty years, while the entire number of acres under crops had also increased. Her great desideratum was that internal tranquillity and respect for law which would alone allay the distrust felt by owners of capital for investments in Ireland—distrust which banished from her soil much of the enterprize and industry that would enable her to run the race of competition with other nations. The department of agriculture for which she was peculiarly suited was the feeding and rearing of live stock; and in manufactures, which in some districts had been carried on with no little success, her redundant population gave her immense advantages. Whether the suggestion made by a noble Lord, a Member of the other House of Parliament, in one of the very able letters which he had published for the registration of farm improvements could be carried out he (Mr. De Grey) would not venture to express an opinion, but it would no doubt receive the careful attention of the Government. A few weeks ago it was hoped that at the meeting of Parliament Her Majesty would have been able to announce that the cattle plague had ceased in the kingdom, but it still appeared to linger in certain districts, and there had been a recent and serious outbreak in the metropolis. While any cases occurred we could not consider ourselves safe from an extensive recurrence of this formidable disease; and its continued existence in an alarming degree on the Continent, and particularly in Holland, rendered it necessary that we should not relax those precautions which had been so successful in, checking, if not in entirely suppressing, its ravages. Suggestions had been made to the Government by the Royal and other great agricultural societies which, in combination with the experience obtained during the last year, would, he felt sure, lead to their proposing to Parliament such measures as might be necessary for continuing and improving, according to circumstances, regulations that had conferred such great and acknowledged benefits on the country. Her Majesty also acknowledged with deep thankfulness the abatement of the visitation of cholera, which at one time threatened alarming consequences in this country; but the superior knowledge of the causes of this pestilence obtained by science, and the attention to precautions suggested by that superior knowledge, had checked, and it was to be hoped would continue to preserve us, under the blessing of Providence, from the ravages of this disease. The evils prevailing in the mercantile naval service had specially attracted public criticism, and had been found to require immediate attention. When men were employed upon services to which any unusual amount of risk attached—and a seaman's life must always be a life of danger—every care should be taken that the ordinary comforts of life should be secured to them as far as was practicable, especially when the absence of these comforts conduced to sickness and disease. Such a service could not fail to be unpopular if the common requirements necessary for the preservation of health were not attended to, and our merchant seamen, who constituted one of the hardiest of our working classes, and to whom we look for the best supply of sailors for the Royal Navy, should at least have no cause to envy the condition of those who entered the same profession in the service of other countries. It was satisfactory to learn that the Government were prepared with a measure to improve the laws regulating the care of the sick and other poor in the metropolis, and for the re-distribution of some of the charges of relief therein. The question was one which undoubtedly required immediate attention. Our hospitals and institutions for the care of the sick poor were a glory and an honour to the country, but private charity could only reach a small portion of the misery which must exist among a population estimated at 3,000,000. It was generally admitted that our workhouse system was inadequate to the requirements of such a population, and the public mind had been disturbed by recent revelations of what had been going on in at least a portion of our metropolitan workhouses and their infirmaries. He could not think that Parliament did its duty if it left to private charity that which was, in fact, one of the first duties of the State; but there would be no need to interfere with those noble institutions which were an admirable supplement, but which could never supersede the necessity of a State provision for the care of the poor in sickness. He now came to that paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech which referred to the vexed question of Reform. During the debates which took place in the last Session, it seemed to have been the general opinion of the House that the representation could not be left in the state in which it now was. The principal question was whether it was possible, with safety to the State, to admit a large proportion of the working classes into the constituency. If this could be done without danger to the Constitution, the feeling of most men's minds would incline to their admission. But our whole system was now one of compensation, in which all great interests were represented in certain proportions. These considerations must not be neglected in dealing with the question of the admission of a large body of working men to the franchise, and Parliament must feel satisfaction in hearing that Her Majesty's Government contemplated measures which would not unduly disturb the balance of political power. If the country generally desired Reform, it did not desire revolution. If Parliament was prepared to give to the working classes increased power, it was not prepared step by step to introduce a democracy. But in dealing with this difficult question one thing was certain, that unless all parties were ready to unite to support measures founded upon a careful consideration of all the points involved in the various discussions which had taken place, and the volumes which had been written on the subject, practically speaking, no measure of Reform was ever likely to be carried in this House. Parliament was informed that its attention would be called to this subject; but he would venture to express an opinion that if the Government should have reason to believe that the subject would be approached rather in a party spirit than with a due regard to all the various interests which required to be represented in this great country, they would scarcely be prudent in undertaking the task of revising the Constitution in the face of a hostile and powerful Opposition. The next question to which Her Majesty drew attention was that of trades unions. The law with respect to trades unions, dating from the year 1825, was that no combination of workmen for raising wages should be unlawful so long as no violence, threats, or intimidation be used. This law appeared to be founded on true principles of justice, but it was evaded in practice, and a system was in operation by which workmen were forced to join unions and combinations against their will, and in direct contravention of the law, and outrages had occurred with the object of intimidating both masters and men. On the other hand, there were complaints on the part of the men of combinations among the masters. Of course, the masters could, on no principle of justice, be deprived of a right which they possess only in common with those who might combine against them. The evils that had been engendered by these disputes were not only injurious to both, and interfered most materially with the general industry of the country, but threatened to transfer that manufacturing prosperity which this country had so long and pre-eminently enjoyed to our great rivals on the Continent. Under these circumstances, he felt confident that all classes throughout the country would hear with feelings of satisfaction and gratitude that an inquiry was to be instituted into the organization of trades unions and other similar associations, whether of workmen or employers, with a view of suggesting a practical remedy for that which was, or might speedily become, a national calamity. There were other measures of internal improvement promised by Her Majesty's Government, but to these he would not more particularly refer, as he felt that he had already too long trespassed upon the attention of the House. He feared that many of the subjects to which he had alluded he had touched upon somewhat superficially; but the multiplicity of subjects and his own inexperience might, perhaps, be considered a sufficient excuse. It was to be hoped that the Session would not be occupied, like the last, by fruitless and unprofitable discussions, but that the measures of improvement proposed by the Government would be allowed to be submitted to the careful and candid consideration of the House, and the fact that Her Majesty's Government had brought forward so large a programme inclined him to think that such, at least, was their expectation; at all events, it was a proof that they had not been idle during the recess. It will be for Parliament to take these measures into consideration, and give effect to such of them as it might approve. He had now only to thank the House for the kind patience with which they had heard him. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey the thanks of this House for Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne:

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers are on a friendly and satisfactory footing, and that we join with Her Majesty in the hope that the termination of the War in which Prussia, Austria, and Italy have been engaged may tend to the establishment of durable Peace in Europe:

"To assure Her Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that Her Majesty has suggested to the Government of the United States a mode by which the questions pending between the two Countries, arising out of the late Civil War, may receive an amicable solution, and which, if met, as Her Majesty trusts it will be, in a corresponding spirit, will remove all grounds of possible misunderstanding, and promote relations of cordial friendship:

"Humbly to express to Her Majesty our participation in Her regret that the War between Spain and the Republics of Chili and Peru still continues, and that the good offices of Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with that of the Emperor of the French, should have failed to effect a reconciliation; and to assure Her Majesty that it will be a cause of satisfaction to us if, either by agreement between the parties themselves, or by the mediation of any other Friendly Power, Peace should be restored:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that discontent, prevailing in some Provinces of the Turkish Empire, has broken out in actual insurrection in Crete; and that, in common with Her Majesty's Allies, the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Russia, Her Majesty has abstained from any active interference in those internal disturbances; but that the efforts of Her Majesty and Her Allies have been directed to bringing about such improved relations between the Porte and its Christian Subjects as are not inconsistent with the Sovereign Rights of the Sultan:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the protracted negotiations, which arose out of the acceptance by Prince Charles of Hohenzollern of the Government of the Danubian Principalities, have been happily terminated by an arrangement to which the Porto has given its ready adhesion, and which has been sanctioned by the concurrence of all the Powers, signatories of the Treaty of 1856:

"Humbly to convey our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that Resolutions in favour of a more intimate Union of the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have been passed by their several Legislatures, and that Delegates, duly authorised, and representing all classes of Colonial party and opinion, have concurred in the conditions upon which such an Union may be best effected; and to assure Her Majesty that we will give our most careful attention to the Bill which, in accordance with the wishes of those Colonies, Her Majesty has directed to be submitted to us, and which, by the consolidation of Colonial interests and resources, will, we trust, give strength to the several Provinces as members of the same Empire, and animated by feelings of loyalty to the same Sovereign:

"To assure Her Majesty that we have heard with deep sorrow that the calamity of Famine has pressed heavily on Her Majesty's Subjects in some parts of India; and to thank Her Majesty for informing us that instructions were issued to Her Majesty's Government in that Country to make the utmost exertions to mitigate the distress which prevailed during the autumn of last year, and that the blessing of an abundant harvest has since that time materially improved the condition of the suffering districts:

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we have observed with deep concern that the persevering efforts and unscrupulous assertions of treasonable Conspirators abroad have during the last autumn excited the hopes of some disaffected persons in Ireland, and the apprehensions of the loyal population; but that we learn with the greatest satisfaction that the firm, yet temperate, exercise of the powers entrusted to the Executive, and the hostility manifested against the Conspiracy by men of all classes and creeds, have greatly tended to restore public confidence, and rendered hopeless any attempt to disturb the general tranquillity; and that, with Her Majesty, we trust that we may consequently be enabled to dispense with the continuance of any exceptional Legislation for that part of Her Majesty's Dominions:

"To assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we join in acknowledging, with deep gratitude to Almighty God, the great decrease which has taken place in the Cholera, and in the Pestilence which has attacked our Cattle; and that we regret that the continued prevalence of the latter in some Foreign Countries, and its occasional re-appearance in this, will still render necessary some special measures of precaution; but that we trust that the visitation of the former will lead to increased attention to those sanitary measures which experience has shown to be its best preventive:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that, estimating as of the highest importance an adequate supply of pure and wholesome Water, Her Majesty has directed the issue of a Commission to inquire into the best means of permanently securing such a supply for the Metropolis, and for the principal towns in densely peopled districts of the Kingdom:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for having directed that the Estimates of the ensuing year shall be laid before us, and for having caused them to be prepared with a due regard to economy, and to the maintenance of efficiency in the Public Service; and to assure Her Majesty that we will cheerfully consider any proposal for a moderate Expenditure, calculated to improve the condition of Her Majesty's Soldiers, and to lay the foundation of an efficient Army of Reserve:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that our attention will again be called to the state of the Representation of the People in Parliament; and, with Her Majesty, humbly to express our hope that our deliberations, conducted in a spirit of moderation and mutual forbearance, may lead to the adoption of measures which, without unduly disturbing the balance of Political Power, shall freely extend the Elective Franchise:

"Humbly to express our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that the frequent occurrence of disagreements between Employers of Labour and their Workmen, causing much private suffering and public loss, and occasionally leading, as is alleged, to acts of outrage and violence, has induced Her Majesty to issue a Commission to inquire into and report upon the organisation of Trades Unions and other Associations, whether of Workmen or Employers, with power to suggest any improvement of the Law for their mutual benefit; and to assure Her Majesty that any application which shall be made to us for Parliamentary Powers, necessary to make this inquiry effective, shall receive our earnest attention :

"To convey to Her Majesty our humble thanks for informing us that Bills will be laid before us for the extension of the beneficial provisions of the Factory Acts to other trades, specially reported on by the Royal Commission on the Employment of Children ; and for the better regulation, according to the principle of those Acts, of workshops where women and children are largely employed :

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the condition of the Mercantile Marine has attracted the serious attention of Her Majesty, and that measures will be submitted to us with a view to increase the efficiency of that important Service :

"Humbly to express to Her Majesty the satisfaction with which we have learnt that relaxations have been lately introduced into the Navigation Laws of France ; that Her Majesty has expressed to the Emperor of the French Her readiness to submit to Parliament a proposal for the extinction, on equitable terms, of the exemptions from local charges on Shipping which are still enjoyed by a limited number of individuals in British Ports ; and that His Imperial Majesty has, in anticipation of this step, already admitted British Ships to the advantage of the new Law ; and to assure Her Majesty that we will give our careful attention to the Bill upon this subject which Her Majesty has directed to be forthwith laid before us :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we will give our most serious consideration to the Bill which will be submitted to us for making better provision for the arrangement of the affairs of Railway Companies which are unable to meet their engagements ; as also to any measures for improving the management of Sick and other Poor in the Metropolis, and for a re-distribution of some of the charges for relief therein :

"To assure Her Majesty that we will give our most careful attention to the measures for the Amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, and the Consolidation of the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Admiralty ; also to the means of disposing, with greater despatch and frequency, of the increasing business in the Superior Courts of Common Law, and at the Assizes :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the relations between Landlord and Tenant in Ireland have engaged the anxious attention of Her Majesty ; and that a Bill will be laid before us which, without interfering with the rights of property, will offer direct encouragement to Occupiers of Land to improve their holdings, and provide a simple mode of obtaining compensation for permanent improvements :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we pray that our labours may, under the blessing of Providence, conduce to the prosperity of the Country, and the happiness of Her People."

MR. GRAVES : Mr. Speaker—I have so invariably experienced the indulgence of the House when, on previous occasions, I have ventured to address it, during the short time I have had the honour to be a Member, that I feel I should be doubting that experience if I sought on this occasion to enlist its sympathy by any formal appeal to its forbearance. In undertaking the onerous task of seconding the Address in reply to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne, no one can have felt more conscious than I did myself how little personal consideration influenced the selection. But sharing in the representation of a constituency possessing no small commercial distinction, I hope it may be thought that I am warranted in accepting the task. Rarely has a Speech been delivered from the Throne which has been looked forward to with more intense interest than that which it had been our good fortune to listen to to-day, and I have the highest hopes that it will not only be satisfactory to the House, but that it will prove acceptable to the country at large. The Speech from the Throne embraces measures of the highest usefulness, aiming largely at the amelioration of the poorer classes of society, and involving questions of the highest moment. It will, I have no doubt, commend itself to the anxious consideration of the House. The felicitous expressions in which the hon. Mover has conveyed his pleasure at Her Majesty's presence to-day will be shared in by every Member of this House, and will excite throughout the country feelings of the greatest satisfaction.

In the few remarks with which I intend to trouble the House, I must necessarily travel over some of the ground that has been touched upon by the hon. Member for West Norfolk ; but I shall endeavour to confine myself more particularly to those points which may be considered to possess more than ordinary interest at the present moment. I think I am justified in giving the pre-eminence among the questions connected with our foreign policy to that of the differences which have arisen between us and the United States—differences arising out of intricate questions of International Law, and which have been made during the past year the subject of a very able diplomatic correspondence. Claims and counter-claims have been advanced in the full consciousness of mutual right; and it will be a matter of the greatest satisfaction if a mode can be suggested by which these claims can be amicably and fairly settled. I believe that when they were originally put forward, the moment was inopportune—that concession might then have been construed into fear on the one hand, or to threats on the other. But now, happily, a better feeling exists. There is a mutual desire to do each other justice. England, above all other nations, is deeply interested in the maintenance of stringent Neutrality Laws; and if it should appear ours are too lax, or are overweighted with legal proof, and that compensation may have to be made, I, for one, will rejoice if that decision should lead to the establishment of clearer views of the duties of neutrals, and also to the adoption of a more intelligible and more stringent Code of International Law for the government of all maritime Powers.

I am sure that this House will share in the regret expressed by Her Majesty that our mediation, in conjunction with that of her ally the Emperor of the French, has not been successful in bringing to a termination the disputes which have arisen between Spain and the Republics of South America. Those Republics should remember how unmistakably the sympathy of Europe was extended towards them at the commencement of those differences; and, remembering this, they should lend a favourable ear to any proposals for a friendly mediation which would be likely to bring these disputes to a settlement. There can be no doubt the longer this settlement is delayed the greater will be the injury to those young and prosperous countries; and therefore I hope that the friendly mediation referred to in Her Majesty's Speech—and by which I presume to be understood the good offices of the President of the United States—will be successful, and that a lasting peace may arise, alike satisfactory to the interests and honour of all parties.

Mr. Graves

From our foreign policy I turn to our domestic affairs, and I am sure that I shall be pardoned if I at once take up the question which engrosses at this moment men's minds, and to which our attention has been specially directed by Her Majesty to-day—I mean Parliamentary Reform. Happily for us we have advanced at that stage when argument becomes no longer necessary to justify the extension of the franchise. It is an admitted necessity by all parties in the State, and the only point that remains to be settled is the means by which a wise, just, and satisfactory settlement of the question can be arrived at. What the mode may be which the Government intend to propose for carrying this object into effect—whether it includes a Re-distribution of Seats Bill—whether it will grapple with the corruption which has been so ruthlessly brought to light in the last few months, and which I consider to be a serious blot upon our electoral system, and a stain on the character of this House—whether it will deal with these questions or not, I have no means of knowing. But I am convinced of this—that the measure will not be framed in any narrow spirit; nor do I believe that it will be submitted to the House in any but the most earnest and honest desire to merit the approval, not only of this House, but of the country at large. The history of Reform justifies the remark which my hon. Friend has made to-night—that it should not be made a party question. So far I do not think that it has made any very great advance under party protection; and speaking for myself, without any inspiration, I think it should be taken out of the category of party questions, that the House should take it under its own protection, and deal with it in the firm determination to settle it on a basis of concession and compromise. I may be wrong in this view, but it is one that I hold strongly, and I throw it out, for what it is worth, for the consideration of the House. Scarcely less important than Parliamentary Reform is the connection between capital and labour—the breach seems rather to be widening than narrowing—and I think Her Majesty's Government has done wisely in deciding that an inquiry shall take place by Commission into this difficult and delicate question; for if the result of the inquiry should be to draw closer the links between the employer and the employed, it will be a subject for much congratulation. I do not know whether it is intended that the inquiry shall embrace the question of the extent to which we are suffering from the effects of foreign competition in branches of industry that have been hitherto considered as England's specialities; but I think it very desirable that this should be done, and that all parties in this country should be shown, on the most unquestionable evidence, the causes which are at work, and what have been the results of their operation.

It is also, I perceive, in contemplation to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the quantity and quality of the water supplied to the metropolis and other large towns in England. The experience of the last twelve months has taught us how largely the public health is affected by the water supply; and no one can question the desirableness of having this very important subject investigated in all its bearings by a Royal Commission, instead of by local and partial inquiries. Living as I do in the centre of one of the most densely-populated districts in the country, I well know the interest with which this question is watched by the people, and the satisfaction with which the announcement of a Commission will be received by all who dwell in large towns. A measure will be submitted to us for enabling insolvent railway companies to make arrangements for settling their affairs. I have no doubt that in that measure due protection will be given to the public rights. It appears that there is no machinery existing at the present moment for meeting such a state of things; and it therefore becomes necessary to take legislative measures for remedying the inconvenience thence arising. We cannot be surprised, knowing the deep interest taken by Her Majesty in the Mercantile Marine, that Her Majesty has been pleased to call our attention to it. Much has, indeed, been done at various times for this branch of our industry. It has been relieved of many burdens and restrictions—but some still remain. There are anomalies, and restrictions, and exceptional burdens still pressing upon it. I think it has been wisely decided by the Government to deal with them; and I hope that, at the same time, the various Acts connected with the Mercantile Marine of the country may come under revision, and that the 600 sections may be consolidated and rendered more intelligible than they now are to owners, masters, and seamen. The allusion to our seamen is no less important.

There are evils at work that require treatment. Some of them may, perhaps, be beyond legislative cure; but I am perfectly satisfied that much in the way of remedy may be effected by wise and prudent legislation. It is possible, no doubt, to have too much legislation; and it becomes a grave question whether we have not had too much for our seamen, for the result has been to keep the owners of ships and their seamen further apart from each other instead of bringing them into closer union. Nothing can be worse than the discipline pointed at in the Speech, involving the shipping interest not only in serious losses and intolerable vexation, but inflicting on the country a large annual expenditure for bringing home deserters under the guise of distressed seamen. It is an increasing charge, for within the last two years it has increased from £25,000 to £30,000 for the mere food of these men—whilst to our shipowners it is a serious and intolerable vexation, in being compelled to provide passages for them. The seamen of the Mercantile Marine must be placed on a better system—a better system of recruiting must be introduced—we must have training ships established—the comfort and health of the seaman must be more carefully looked after—shipowners themselves must become more conscious of their responsibilities, and the commanders must take a greater interest in the welfare and comfort of their men. Then, and not till then, are we likely to see that permanent improvement in the Mercantile Marine which will enable us to look upon it as we have always done, as the boast of this country. The relaxation of the Navigation Laws—thanks to the enlightened policy of the Emperor of the French—is one which may be regarded with great satisfaction. From the 1st of January the tonnage duties collected from ships have ceased to be collected in the French ports, except in the instance of the ships of nations which have refused to grant in return similar privileges to French ships. Anticipating the desire that this country would only be too glad to assist in shaking off the remaining fetters from commerce, France has, without asking, placed the shipping of this country upon the most favourable footing; and a measure will be submitted to the House for ratifying that understanding, and I have no doubt that the removal of the few exceptional restrictions will be based on terms as equitable in their nature as the proposal itself is justifiable upon public policy. The question of Law Reform is one of the very greatest interest. There is no doubt whatever that the judicial force and the machinery of our Law Courts has not kept pace with the progress of the country or the wants of trade. I am glad that the evils arising from the loss of temper, the loss of time, and the loss of money, attendant on the present system are likely to be removed. As to the advantage of the consolidation of the Divorce Court and the Admiralty Court, I am not very competent to speak; but I venture to hope that when the measure is brought before the House for dealing with the Admiralty Court, it will not be forgotten that there is a great necessity for reforming the Court of Admiralty itself, for making more summary its proceedings, and for extending its jurisdiction to classes of maritime commerce not now embraced, and which at present, owing to the expense and trouble involved in Admiralty proceedings, are either confided to arbitration or are never dealt with at all. I trust also that the advantages of a reconstituted Admiralty Court will not be confined to the metropolis; but that the great maritime ports of England, which furnish so large a share to the business of that Court, will have its advantages brought to their own doors by the establishment of Vice Admiralty Courts. As to the amendment of our Bankruptcy Laws, I cannot for a moment doubt the propriety. They are generally condemned—they are found inadequate to the proper protection of the trader—they are cumbrous—and they are expensive. I hope that in dealing with these laws some provision will be made to check the commercial immorality which has shown itself so widely within the last twelve months in the disgraceful failures which have taken place. It is true there are palliating circumstances for many of these failures in the terrible crisis which swept over the country last year.

Judging by the tests which are usually applied by this House as to whether any year has been a successful one or otherwise, the past year would rank as an eminently prosperous one, for our imports and exports have increased to a very large extent. Our imports, taken for nine months of the financial year last made up, compared with the same months in the preceding year, show an excess of £42,000,000, and our exports show an excess of £23,000,000. It is not improbable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may, by-and-bye, be able to announce to the House that the revenue has been equally elastic, and has more than answered his expectations. But the popular estimate of last year is very different, and is much more likely to be true than any conclusions based upon the figures I have just given. A crisis of unparalleled severity, causing a wide-spread derangement of credit, involved every branch of our National industry in most serious losses. These panics appear to be periodical in their character and uniform in their visitations; and I think it is well worthy of consideration whether some effort may not be made to ascertain their causes. Believing that excessive credit and abuse of the principle of limited liability had much to do with the crisis of last year, it was with sincere pleasure that I heard the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) give notice of his intention to bring before the House the results of the limited liability system. The shock which it has received will do much to disarm the power for evil of that system for the future; but I think, while the cause and the effects are fresh upon our minds, we should be wise in reviewing the provisions of the Act, and preventing such mischiefs from occurring in future. The manufacturing interest has happily suffered less than the commercial; but the exorbitant rate which money maintained for a large portion of the current year, must have largely paralysed the manufacturing energy of this country. These fluctuations in the value of money, occurring so frequently as they do, are exceedingly embarrassing to trade; and I hope that Parliament, in its wisdom, may be able to devise some means for, if not preventing, at least regulating these fluctuations. With the third great branch of our industrial economy—agriculture—I am not so conversant; but I cannot help expressing my earnest sympathy with that interest, for the twofold calamity which has fallen upon it—the cattle plague and the indifferent harvest. These may be regarded as natural visitations; but they go to swell the disasters of the past year, and to make the amendment of the Bankruptcy Law the more necessary. With regard to Ireland, I will now refer specially to the measures for the amelioration of that country which are alluded to in the Speech from the Throne. I hope that these are but the harbingers of a new policy—a policy founded upon a just appreciation of the distinctions of race. I venture to think that the statesmen who seek to make that country contented and happy must do so rather by the application of legislation suited to the character and condition of the country than by the application of any uniform system of law. Holding these opinions, I rejoice that a measure will be introduced for the settlement of the long-veiled question of land tenure in Ireland. Public policy demands that that fertile land should be made as fruitful as possible, and that the occupiers of the soil should be encouraged and should have secured to them the fruits of the capital and the skill which they invest in the improvement of the land. I know that on this subject there exists the most varied opinions; but I have known Ireland long, and I have a right to express my opinion on the subject, for I consider under the existing laws, that encouragement and that security do not exist. Mercifully freed as that country has been from the ravages of the cattle plague and the commercial disasters so heavily felt in this country, Ireland has been making in material wealth at least a steady progress. She has added £2,500,000 to the value of her live stock within the last official year, and the deposits in her savings banks, which in the year 1840 amounted to £5,500,000, in 1860 reached £15,000,000, and in 1865 amounted to £17,500,000; thus showing that there is capital in the country for the improvement of land, and that there is not that absence of thrift in the national character which is so frequently alleged. One question I must allude to as having a deep bearing on the prosperity of that country—I mean the question of railways. At present there is a total want of system with respect to them, and they are so disconnected that I believe the resources of that country will never be developed until the railways are placed on a better footing. The fares ought to be lower, and greater facilities ought to be given to make the masses of the population customers of the railways. At present they are looked upon as a luxury rather than a necessity. In order to effect improvements, State interference may possibly be required; but I believe the increase of traffic would in time reimburse the State for any obligations it might incur with regard to them. If a precedent is wanted I might point to

India, and I think before long we may be able to point to one nearer home, for I am convinced that the necessity of taking over the telegraph system will force itself on the attention of the Government, and under the able management of the Post Office would increase its usefulness to an extent now little dreamt of, besides adding largely to our National revenues. The progress of the country has been greatly retarded by the discontent which has existed for the last few years under the name of Fenianism, and which has spread a blighting influence over the whole island; but the announcement made to-day in the Speech from the Throne points to a happier state of things, and leads us to believe that reason and common sense are resuming their sway, and that the spirit of discontent is yielding to a spirit of hope and loyalty. The wise and conciliatory government of the distinguished nobleman who is at present Her Majesty's Viceroy in Ireland (the Marquess of Abercorn) has largely contributed to this result—a compliment equally deserved by the nobleman who preceded him (the Earl of Kimberley). I accept, as marking a new era, the measures announced by the Government. I look upon them as a harbinger of peace, and as a proof that the spirit of Fenianism is drawing towards an end. It is not unnatural that I should turn from Ireland to our North American Provinces, where, if there had been any good ground for its reception, Fenianism might have been expected to find a home. But the miserable attempts made there to introduce it only tested the loyalty of the colonists, and proved how strong was the tie which binds the colonies to the mother country. In order to appreciate the advantages of consolidation it is perhaps necessary to visit them, and to become conversant, as I have become, with their almost inexhaustible resources, and the steady energy of the people. Covering 400,000 square miles, embracing near 4,000,000 of people, bound together by a community of interests and devotedly attached to the institutions of this country and to the Throne and person of the Queen, it would be difficult to speculate as to the results which may grow out of the union of these fine Provinces. I have heard it said that there is danger to Imperial interests in this measure, and that national aspirations may arise. I have no such fear. I believe the connection between the North American Provinces and the mother country rests on more enduring foundations, and that they will be more than ever an important element in our national resources. Knowing as I do the difficulties which must have beset the negotiations for such a consolidation—the jealousies and rivalries which must have arisen, and the personal sacrifices which must have been made—I should not be doing justice to the delegates from the Provinces if I did not say they are entitled to the highest credit for the manner in which they have fulfilled their delicate but most important duties.

I have now to thank the House for the indulgence which has been shown to me, and to express a hope that the measures alluded to in the Speech—measures of vast importance to the country—may be dealt with by the House in a spirit of forbearance, wisdom, and conciliation. And my highest wish is that at the end of the Session we may be permitted to look back with satisfaction and to feel that among the measures we have passed is one for widening the bases of our institutions, and that by our legislation we have contributed to the happiness and well-being of the people of this country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That," &c. [See Page 54.]

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of supporting the Address which has been moved and seconded from the opposite Benches. I heartily approve that well-established rule which on all occasions discourages the needless importation of subjects of difference into the debate on the Address to the Crown in answer to the Royal Speech; and I confess that on this occasion, independently of much other matter which the Address contains, and which we should wish to see brought out in discussion with the most favourable auspices, there are three announcements which of themselves would suffice, I think, to make any candid and well-judging man reluctant to see dissension introduced into this debate. I mean the announcement of a measure for the union of the North American Provinces; the announcement of a measure on that most important subject, the state of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland—and, I must add, in terms in which I do not think the most fastidious among us can find anything to object to; and thirdly, the announcement, not less gratifying than either of the others, but even more gratifying, that in the judgment of Her Majesty's Government the time has arrived when the existence of exceptional, and in one sense arbitrary, power in Ireland may reach its termination. I not only, therefore, am unprepared to move any Amendment on the Address myself, but if there were any Gentleman who entertained a different disposition, and to whom I might without impropriety offer a recommendation, I would earnestly beseech him to forbear from executing such an intention. Passing, however, to the subjects—the numerous and important subjects—touched upon in the Speech from the Throne, I am anxious to offer some remarks on some paragraphs which the Speech contains. And first, I will dwell for a moment on that very momentous question, the Correspondence between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the United States of America, in reference to questions pending between the two countries, which questions have arisen out of the late Civil War. And I wish to convey an assurance to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the part of all with whom I have had an opportunity of communicating, that whatever he may have done or whatever he may propose to do on the subject will be judged, not in the narrow spirit of exacting from him, or endeavouring to exact from him, a precise conformity to the steps we ourselves have taken, but that as long as his measures and his policy may in our view be consistent with the honour and conducive to the interests of the country, everything which may proceed from him and his Colleagues will receive at our hands a most favourable consideration. Then I go on to the paragraph in the Speech relating to the insurrection which has distracted—I know not to what extent it still distracts—the important island of Candia. I miss from the Royal Speech an intimation which it is very common to convey—that upon certain subjects, and especially subjects of foreign policy, which have reached a certain degree of maturity, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to submit papers to the House. Indeed, I observe that an hon. Friend of mine (Mr. Gregory) has already given notice of his desire to obtain information in that shape, and I feel myself justified in expressing a hope that Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to lay before us such information on the subject as they possess—for this question is one which, although of foreign concern, yet cannot be regarded as very remote from our interests; nay, more, it cannot be regarded as a question in which we are altogether without rights. We know not at present from any authentic source the cause of this insurrection: we know, however, the deplorable calamities with which it has been attended, and the desperate resolution with which, against enormous odds, the battle has been fought. Now, what I am desirous to know—and I hope that the papers when presented by Her Majesty's Government will prove what I am desirous to know—is that the Government of the Sultan is not responsible for this insurrection, but that it had, before the commencement of the outbreak, given faithful and full execution to that important instrument—the hatti-scheriff—issued at the close of the Crimean war for the purpose of securing to the Christian subjects of the Porte at least the civil equality to which they were justly entitled, and which had been too long withheld. This is a question not only of the utmost gravity in itself, but one of justice in its connection with the general interests of humanity rather than with any special British interests in a more narrow sense; and it is likewise of the utmost importance with reference to the future peace of Europe. I congratulate Her Majesty's Government most cordially that the time has arrived when they are able to promise us—forming their judgment on the circumstances of the moment—that they will not, under these circumstances, apply for an extension of the exceptional powers of the Government in Ireland; and I join with them in rejoicing that the spirit which has been displayed by the community itself in aid of the Government has proved to be so potent an ally in averting the evil which at one time we had been led to apprehend—a phenomenon new in the history of Ireland—a phenomenon which, I trust, will lead to much reflection upon its causes, and which, after that reflection, will prove a powerful encouragement to us to prosecute the policy of liberality and of justice towards Ireland, of which, in part, we have already witnessed the happy effect. Her Majesty's Government refer to a subject of great interest in connection with the condition of the army, and with the foundation of an efficient army of reserve. If I caught correctly the words of the Address, the promise which it is proposed to make to Her Majesty's Government in return is that we will cheerfully consider any demand which may be made for our assent to a moderate increase of expenditure. Now, I must confess that, if I were a captious critic, I should a little doubt whether cheerfulness of consideration is exactly that form of consideration which representatives of the people should give to proposals for an increase of expenditure. A careful and a ready consideration I have no doubt that subject will have, and I trust a fair and even a liberal consideration. Most certainly I express my confidence that, while we shall expect the Government to show that expenses which are perhaps necessary in one direction can be compensated by savings in another, the Government will receive the cordial support of this House in every well-conceived and every effectual measure for the attainment of that most desirable object, the foundation of a good system of army reserve. The Speech also touches upon a subject as delicate as it is important in the reference it makes to an inquiry that is about to be instituted into the disagreements between employers of labour and their workmen, and into the means by which that inquiry is to be prosecuted. I think there have been exaggerated statements made on this subject, which may to a certain extent have acted on the public mind. Such statements tend to propagate the idea either that differences between employers and workmen are now of a more aggravated character than in former times, or that the effect of these differences is to menace the commercial and trading position of this country. If there be those who really entertain that apprehension, let them pay attention to a single sentence in the speech of the Seconder of the Address, which acquainted us that the joint increase in the exports and imports from and to this country for nine months of the last year, as compared with nine months of the year preceding, amounted to £65,000,000. But that is no reason why the attention of Parliament should not in every useful manner be given to a subject which is of the utmost importance, and a matter in which undoubtedly there are yet serious difficulties and serious evils to be remedied. What I hope is that the interposition of Government in this matter will be an amicable interposition; and in particular, that when my right

hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department frames his Bill for obtaining from Parliament powers to make the inquiry effective he will bear in mind—as I am sure he will—the full and absolute right of all individuals, employers and workmen alike, to bring to market the commodity they have to dispose of, whether it be labour or capital, on the best terms in their power, as long as, and only as long as, they exercise their own rights without prejudice to the rights of others. There is but one other subject on which I have to detain the House for a few moments, and it is the subject to which—as has been rightly said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves)—there attaches at the present time an all-absorbing interest—I mean the question of the representation of the people. But I will here first offer a comment upon that which many of us had anxiously expected to see alluded to, but which, probably for some good and sufficient cause, does not appear in the Speech. I presume that is probably owing to the circumstance that the recent inquiries into corrupt practices in certain boroughs are not yet so absolutely completed as to have enabled the Government to advise the Crown to refer to this subject. At all events, nothing was said in regard to it. I am sure it is one which, from its importance, well deserves notice. If the question of Parliamentary Reform be difficult, at least it ought not to be difficult to deal with certain of its branches, such as cases of proved corruption. I beg to say that this evil, which has grown, perhaps, not more intense—I hope, on the contrary, less intense—but which has grown far more patent, and therefore more scandalous, of late years, has now become a matter not merely of domestic policy and expediency, but I will even venture to say of national honour. As long as we were in something like exclusive possession of a representative system, little notice was taken of these offences in foreign lands; but we have lived into a period in which almost every country possesses, in more or less perfect forms, representative institutions, and in which some countries enjoy them in high efficiency. Since that has been the case, it appears to me that Europe has conceived what I might almost call a sentiment of disgust at finding that evils of which those countries are scarcely conscious have become so rife and so virulent among ourselves. I hope it will be understood that I assume there is a cause for silence in Her Majesty's Speech on this subject; but I must express the hope that when Her Majesty's Government take into their consideration some of the Reports—I will not now presume to decide which they may be—in which it shall appear, on judicial authority, that constituencies are tainted, as they have been in some former and well-remembered instances, they will not ask us to inflict the almost nominal and wholly unsatisfactory punishments which have bounded our action on former occasions, but will give evidence to the world, by something in the nature of strictness and severity, that we are in earnest on this particular question. As regards the paragraph in the Speech of Her Majesty, it is obviously open to the remark that its language is in some degree enigmatical; but I do not think it will be fair to make that circumstance a subject of complaint. On the contrary, I think Her Majesty's Government are perfectly justified in reserving that full explanation of their intentions to a future day which, if it had been attempted to-day, in a form necessarily imperfect, would probably have tended to prejudice the settlement of the question. Therefore, in assenting to the paragraph as it stands, I do so upon the double ground that there is nothing in its language which can give rise to a just reflection; and, important as is every matter connected with this subject, both as to substance and as to procedure, under present circumstances, I, for myself, and others, if they are so minded, retain the most perfect liberty to canvass, both as to substance and as to procedure, the measures and the steps to be taken by Her Majesty's Government, when in the proper time we become fully acquainted with them. I think there are three points in which may be summed up, in a great degree, our interest in the consideration and management of this matter. There is the question by whom the measure of Parliamentary Reform is to be submitted to Parliament; there is the question what is to be the substance and effect of such a measure; and lastly, there is the question when such a measure is to be brought under our notice, and when it is to reach its completion. As regards the first of those questions—by whom the measure is to be submitted—I humbly represent to the House that at this moment the interest of the country in the speedy settlement of the question is all-important; and, if there be any of us who are less sanguine than hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the possible proceedings of Her Majesty's Government, that is no reason for endeavouring to cast impediments in their course. It is our duty to accept, wherever we can get it, a measure which will be adequate to meet the just expectations of the country; and if we intend to be willing parties to the introduction of such a measure by Her Majesty's Government, we ought not by anything we may now say or do to cast even the smallest difficulty in the way of that introduction. Sir, as respects the substance of the measure, I do not think the present occasion a proper one to discuss it; but as respects the time of the measure, I must again say, it appears to me that even the question of the substance is hardly more important. It is not necessary now to retrace the wearisome and irksome details of this protracted controversy, or to remind the House how many Sessions, how many Queen's Speeches, how many Parliaments have been involved. One thing only we can say, and that is, it is impossible for legislation to proceed in its orderly and accustomed course until this matter is disposed of—until this matter is disposed of it stops the way; it disturbs and impedes, and it not only disturbs and impedes, but it embitters every attempt to deal with other questions of difficulty. The vast and varied interests of this country, growing apparently more vast and more varied every day, and, in proportion as we reap the harvest of legislation with assiduity, causing new and thicker crops to spring afresh from the ground soliciting our attention, render it our duty to see and require that the measures adopted—so far as we can require from others—shall be directed towards the attainment, not only of an effectual, but also of a speedy settlement of this question. I therefore ask myself how I am to interpret the paragraph in which this subject has been brought under our notice, and I cannot doubt as to the manner in which I am justified in construing it. I will not ask for explanations; I will not make any remark which would have a tendency to force the Government to offer explanation for the purpose of avoiding misapprehension; but what I understand by this paragraph is this:—Her Majesty's Government, like ourselves, like the generality of the House, including their own followers and the whole country without distinction of party, are sensible of the necessity of dealing promptly with this matter, and that, upon the earliest day which they can choose for the purpose, they will be prepared to propose, on their own responsibility, such measures as they shall think will be most effectual for the attainment, the effective attainment, and, above all, the speedy attainment of their object and the just satisfaction of the wishes of the country. I hope there is nothing unreasonable in that expectation. If that expectation be a just one, we ought to rest perfectly satisfied, cherishing the hope that the time is at hand when we may be able to remove from ourselves and out of the way this obstacle, and to remove from ourselves what threatens to become, if we do not remove it, a standing discredit to Parliament and the institutions of the land, and to give to all the other vast and diversified interests of the country that attention which they so imperatively solicit at our hands.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I heard, Sir, with great satisfaction from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) that there was no prospect of an Amendment to the Address being proposed to-night. After so long a separation it really is far from agreeable that on the first night we meet together we should resume our struggles; and in the months that are before us many opportunities will arise to compensate hon. Gentlemen for the self-restraint which they exercise now. There are one or two points to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred which I will notice before I touch on his last more interesting inquiry. The right hon. Gentleman has done justice to the contents of Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, and I think I may congratulate my Colleagues upon its reception by the House generally, though I am sure we owe it in some degree to the able interpretation which has been put upon it by my hon. Friends who moved and seconded the Address, the first with a pleasing propriety I am sure all must acknowledge, the Secunder with a weight of authority derived from his position and his acquaintance with commercial pursuits. In answer to the question which has been put by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the disturbances in Crete, I may say that papers will certainly be presented on the subject. I believe my noble Friend (Lord Stanley) had a reason which for a short time may influence him in not immediately presenting them to the House;

but when that reason ceases to operate, my noble Friend will take the earliest opportunity of laying them on the table of the House. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) also referred to the circumstance that no allusion was made in the Queen's Speech to the inquiries into proceedings in certain boroughs. The reason why we made no reference to these inquiries was that the reports of them have not been received by the Government. [An hon. MEMBER: Not all.] Some have; but the right hon. Gentleman will feel that it would be convenient and proper to have them all in our possession before we make any announcement on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman then, in a tone of which I am sure I have no cause to complain, referred to the paragraph in the Speech announcing that the attention of Parliament will be called to the state of the representation of the people; and I think the right hon. Gentleman, remembering, I have no doubt, his experience in the position which I now have the honour to occupy, felt how very inconvenient it would be if, on the first day of the Session, a number of inquiries were made the answers to which might only lead to misapprehension, and which would really not be fair to those who are responsible for the consequences. I will not trouble the right hon. Gentleman and the House at any length upon the subject, because, with the permission of the House, I mean to take, not only an early, but the earliest day at our command in order to bring the whole subject before the House. [An hon. MEMBER: What day?] Monday next. That is the first day at our disposal, and I then propose to state the course which the Government mean to take upon this subject, and generally to enter into the matter. I trust, therefore, that under these circumstances we may not be pressed to make any statements to-night, but that we may be allowed to reserve our views and state them fully on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman has done justice to the important subjects which have been brought under the notice of the House in the Speech from the Throne. I am aware, as all must be aware, that it will require on the part of the House considerable effort to do justice to the several themes which will be brought before them. But re-action is the law of life, and it is the characteristic of the House of Commons. There have been complaints of late of indolence and want of assiduity on the part of this House.

It is said that we have passed through Session after Session without doing what our duty required. Now, in this Session an admirable opportunity will be afforded to the House, and if they only follow the example which the Government are prepared to set by the devotion of their time and labour to the pursuit of these propositions, I think we need not be frightened by the quantity of business before us, but may rather look forward to the end of a Session which will redound to the public advantage and to the character of this Assembly.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed, to draw up an Address to be presented to Her Majesty upon the said Resolution:—Mr. DE GREY, Mr. GRAVES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Lord STANLEY, General PEELE, Viscount CRANBOURNE, Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, Lord JOHN MANNERS, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, Lord NAAS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. HUNT, and Colonel TAYLOR, or any Five of them:—To withdraw immediately:—Queen's Speech referred.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock.

REPORT OF ADDRESS.

Report of Address brought up and read.

On Motion, to agree to the Address—

MR. HADFIELD complained that no allusion had been made in the Speech to the question of church rates, although it would be in the recollection of the House that a Bill dealing with that subject was actually read a second time last Session.

Mr. WALPOLE rose to order. I do not know whether it is usual for an hon. Member to go into a subject not immediately relating to the Address. The course being taken by the hon. Gentleman is somewhat inconvenient, and may lead to some discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be open to the hon. Member, on the Question that the Address be read a second time, to refer to any particular passage in the Address, or to move an Amendment, but not to open a discussion on subjects irrelevant to the Address.

Mr. HADFIELD believed that he was in order, and that he had a right to notice a palpable omission in the Address, and to argue that an addition ought to be made to it. He did not want to raise any discussion upon the matter; but he thought that reference in the Address ought to be made to a subject of debate in that House for the last thirty years, and that some intimation should be given to the country on the subject of church rates. It appeared to him that they ought not to blink a question of thirty years' standing in that House. The House had by large majorities established the principle that abolition should be either entire, or that persons should not be sued for church rates. He therefore begged leave to move an addition to the Address to the effect that this House represents to Her Majesty its regret that no allusion whatever has been made in the Speech from the Throne to the subject of church rates—a subject which had been repeatedly discussed in this House. In his opinion the matter ought to be disposed of; and that it would be a great relief to the country if it were removed from discussion. He certainly understood last Session that an attempt would be made by the Government to deal with the question, and they ought not to shrink from it.

Mr. BAINES, in seconding the Motion, said, that the subject was one of so much importance, and had occupied so very prominent a position in the discussions of this House for many years, and especially last Session, that he could not but think it was exceedingly right for the House to express its regret that no mention was made of the subject in the Royal Speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Sheffield is quite in order in expressing an opinion upon the subject; but with regard to the proposal that he has made, according to the rules of this House, he is not in order. The time for moving an Amendment to the Address is while it is under discussion for the second reading; but after the Motion has been put from the Chair that the House do agree with the Committee in the said Resolutions, the opportunity has passed. Accordingly, he cannot now move the Amendment. The Question for the House is that the House do agree with the said Address.

Address agreed to; to be presented by Privy Councillors.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

QUESTION.

Mr. HIBBERT said, the Home Secretary would probably be able to answer a Question, of which he had privately given him notice—namely, Whether it is his intention to bring in any Bill based on the Report of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment; and, if so, whether that Bill will contain clauses as to the mode of carrying out capital punishment?

Mr. WALPOLE said, the Bill of last year did not come down from the House of Lords till nearly the close of the Session. The Government, exercising the best judgment upon the subject of which they were capable, thought it ought to be amended in point of form. But he could now inform his hon. Friend that two Bills had been already prepared, having for their object to separate the two distinct branches of the subject—namely, one relating to the law of murder, the other to the mode in which capital offences are to be carried into execution. The two Bills would shortly be introduced, and hon. Members would have an opportunity of considering their provisions.

Mr. HADFIELD wanted to know whether the Government had any Bill prepared founded upon the Report of the Commission on Oaths and Declarations.

Mr. WALPOLE: No; there is no Bill prepared at the present moment, because the Commission has not as yet made its Report.

FINSBURY ESTATE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYTON, Bill to appropriate a portion of the income of the estate lately belonging to the Prebend of Finsbury, in the Cathedral of St. Paul, London, for the relief of spiritual destitution in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYETON and Mr. LOCKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 1.]

PARISH OF CANONGATE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. M'LAREN, Bill to abolish the Annuity Tax, or Ministers' Money, in the Parish of Canongate within Edinburgh, and to make provision in regard to the Stipends of the Ministers in that parish and city, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'LAREN, Mr. DUNLOP, and Mr. BAIRD.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES (VOTING PAPERS)
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH, Bill to afford Shareholders of Joint Stock Companies facilities for voting by means of Voting Papers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH, Mr. ROBERT TORRENS, and Mr. VANCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 3.]

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 7, 1867.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Masters and Operatives (3); Public Schools (4); Traffic Regulation (Metropolis) * (5); Lis pendens * (6).

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD ST. LEONARDS presented a Bill for establishing courts of arbitration or conciliation for the settlement of disputes between masters and workmen. It is necessary, the noble Lord remarked, to take some steps for preventing the strikes which are so detrimental to our industry and manufactures. To put a stop to a strike by law, when once it has commenced, is perfectly impossible, because a state of war is then established between the master and his workmen, and this can be terminated by nothing but victory on the one side or the other. If, however, courts of conciliation are established, there can be no doubt that they will be freely resorted to, and that their action will tend both to prevent and to arrange disputes. Under the Bill which he proposed to introduce, leave will be given to the masters and men in every district to establish such courts; but it will not be compulsory upon them to do so, nor even to submit to their jurisdiction when they are established. If, however, either masters or men do attend them, and do refer their disputes to them, then the decision pronounced by these tribunals will have judicial force and would be enforceable by law. The principle of the Bill has received the approval of a deputation of operatives representing 100,000 men engaged in the building trades of the metropolis, who had an interview with him a short time ago.

A Bill to establish equitable Councils of Conciliation to adjust Differences between Masters and Operatives—Was presented by The Lord ST. LEONARDS; read 1^a. (No. 3.)

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE EARL OF DERBY, in laying on the table a Bill to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Public Schools, stated that the measure was almost identical with that which had been introduced last year, but which was sent to the other House of Parliament at so late a period of the Session that it was found impossible to pass it into law.

A Bill to make further Provision for the good Government and Extension of certain Public Schools—Was presented by The Earl of DERBY; read 1^a. (No. 4.)

ACCIDENTS IN COAL MINES.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for Copies of a Circular Letter from the Home Office to, and Reports from, the Inspectors of Mines to the Secretary of State for the Home Department as to the recent Accidents and Explosions in Coal Mines."

LORD WHARNCLIFFE, in moving for further papers, said, he hoped he might regard the Motion of the noble Earl as an indication that the attention of the Government was directed to the important question of the inspection of mines. Living as he did in the neighbourhood of the scene of one of the recent calamities, he had given much consideration to the subject, and thought that the law ought to be amended so as to give inspectors of mines additional powers. In one instance which came within his own knowledge a mine was supposed to be in a dangerous state. The person who was interested in it warned those who worked in it of the danger, and at the same time a letter was written to the Government inspector, who replied that nothing could be done in the matter. The number of inspectors at present existing was quite inadequate to the work to be performed. Instead of their visiting mines only when they were reported to be unsafe, every mine ought to be regularly and periodically inspected. He hoped that the Government would devote their attention to the subject, and would introduce the necessary amendments into the Act of Parliament.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in reply, said, that there would be no objection to produce the document desired by the noble Lord; and further stated that it was the intention of the Home Secretary to refer all the papers to the Committee of the House of Commons which sat last Session to inquire into the subject of the inspection of mines, and which it was intended to re-appoint this year. He entirely agreed with the noble Lord as to the insufficiency of the number of inspectors. Mr. Wynne, the inspector of the Staffordshire district, told him the other day that he had under his charge 300 or more collieries and 900 mines; and that he could never inspect more than three mines a day, and sometimes only one. It was therefore impossible that he could make an inspection of each of these mines as often even as once a year.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Address for—

Copies of a Circular Letter from the Home Office to, and Reports from, the Inspectors of Mines to the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the recent Accidents and Explosions in Coal Mines; together with the Letter of Instructions of 29th January 1867, from the Secretary of State for the Home Department to Mr. Sothern the recently appointed Inspector of Mines.—(The Earl of Belmore.)

TRAFFIC REGULATION (METROPOLIS) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for regulating the Traffic in the Metropolis, and for making Provision for the greater Security of Persons passing through the Streets; and for other purposes—Was presented by The Earl of BELMORE; read 1st. (No. 5.)

LIS FENDENS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Companies Act, 1862, and also the Act passed in the Session held in the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Years of the Reign of Her Majesty, intituled "An Act to simplify and amend the Practice as to the Entry of Satisfaction on Crown Debts and on Judgments"—Was presented by The Lord ST. LEONARDS; read 1st. (No. 6.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

INDIA—FAMINE IN ORISSA.

QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE asked the Secretary for India, Whether he is able to report any considerable decrease in the famine in Orissa; and he wished, in addition, to ask whether the noble Lord is prepared to lay any papers relating to the subject on the table of the House?

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: Yes, I am happy to say that a considerable decrease of the famine has been reported. In fact, distress now only exists in those districts in which the inundations of last autumn destroyed the growing crops. In those districts there will be, I fear, considerable distress, but they are only of very limited extent. With regard to the papers, I hope that I shall be able to lay them before the House at an early period; but until the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the subject has been received, I do not think it would be just to officers of Government in the Presidency of Bengal to lay before the House the very partial information which we at present possess.

MERCANTILE MARINE.

QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is his intention to introduce a measure to consolidate and amend the Laws regulating our Mercantile Marine?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am aware that it is an object of considerable importance to consolidate and amend the laws relating to our Mercantile Marine. I am afraid, however, the task is one of great difficulty and labour. That, however, would not be any reason for our declining to undertake it. The reason why we are not now prepared with a measure of the kind is this:—It is our intention to introduce a Bill containing several important Amendments of the present law, and I think it will be much more satisfactory to discuss these Amendments by themselves. The Bill will be introduced into the House as early as the state of public business will allow. If we shall be able within a reasonable time to pass it, I hope we shall have time to prepare a Consolidation Bill and to lay it on the table of the House before the end of the Session, so that it may be well considered before the discussion be taken on it in the following Session.

OPENING OF THE SESSION—ACCESS OF MEMBERS TO THE HOUSE—POLICE ORDERS.—QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, By whose authority Sir Richard Mayne, Chief Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis, issued certain Orders to the police that no Members of Parliament be allowed to approach the Houses of Parliament in their carriages after a certain hour on the occasion of Her Majesty graciously opening Parliament in person; and why, when they were by this order obliged to descend from their carriages, no path whatever was kept open for them; whether it was not the undoubted constitutional right of Members to attend Her Majesty on such an occasion; and whether such Order of the Commissioner of Police was not in direct defiance of a Sessional Order of that House; and why the hoarding the whole length of Bridge Street was kept, and still kept, entirely closed?

MR. CRAWFORD said, that as this was a question which concerned very nearly the privileges of the House, he claimed this opportunity of stating, by way of complaint, what his own experience had been in coming from the City on Tuesday last. On arriving at the Surrey side of Westminster Bridge he was stopped by a cordon of police and informed that he could not pass over the bridge. He stated that he was a Member of the House of Commons, and was proceeding to Westminster to discharge a public duty. Some demur was made, but eventually he was allowed to go on. On arriving at the Westminster side of the bridge, he found that he could not reach the House by the usual mode of access through Palace Yard in consequence of the hoarding which had been extended much further than it was last Session. He found also that Bridge Street was entirely blocked up by an immense concourse of persons, so that he could not get through by that route. There was no policeman at hand to refer to; and he had, therefore, to consider whether he should force his way through the crowd, or choose the alternative of re-crossing the bridge and going over Lambeth or Blackfriars Bridge. Finding retreat very difficult, he essayed the task of finding his way through the crowd. After considerable difficulty he succeeded in getting through the barrier to the other side owing to the friendly intervention of a policeman. When he reached Parliament Street he was in a state in which it would hardly have been decent to present himself to that House. His boots had been trodden on, and his clothes were covered with mud. Now, what happened to him happened also to several other Members of that House, among whom he might mention the Member for Dover, the Member for Buckingham, the Member for Inverness, and the Member for Bridgwater. The hon. Member for Inverness had to return over Westminster Bridge and proceed in a cab over Waterloo Bridge, and so to Charing Cross, where he was told he must alight. He did so, and proceeded on foot to the House through the pelting rain and mud two inches deep. On the other side of Westminster Bridge Members were called on to identify themselves by showing their cards or in some other way. Now, he maintained this was subjecting them to a great indignity. He did not complain on account of his personal inconvenience—indeed, it might be regarded as a subject of pleasantry by some persons—and as for the crowd he had no complaint to make against them, as he had never seen so vast a concourse of people in such good spirits and so happy. He should, in fact, be the last person to complain of their very natural hilarity, and had no wish to interfere with what was regarded as an annual holiday. What he complained of was the manner in which the Police Order had been issued. No steps had been taken to provide that persons coming from the City to the House of Parliament over Westminster Bridge—as he himself had been accustomed to do for the last ten years—should not be debarred from coming to the House. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Order issued by Sir Richard Mayne was an annual one, and issued as a matter of course; and, whether steps would be taken on similar occasions to facilitate the access of Members to the House?

MR. WALPOLE: With regard to the observations which have just fallen from the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford), I have to say that I was not aware of the personal inconvenience to which he had been exposed on the occasion of the opening of Parliament, or I should have made particular inquiries into the matter. In regard to the Question addressed to me by the noble Lord (Lord Ernest Bruce), I think he will find he is entirely mistaken in his impression as to the Orders issued to the police. The noble Lord asks “by whose authority Sir Richard Mayne, Chief Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis, issued certain Orders to the police that no Members of Parliament be allowed to approach the Houses of Parliament in their carriages after a certain hour on the occasion of Her Majesty graciously opening Parliament in person?” And then he goes on to ask, “Why, when they were by this Order obliged to descend from their carriages, no path whatever was kept open for them?” Now, my reply is simply this. No such Order as is referred to in that Question has been issued by Sir Richard Mayne. I hold in my hand extracts from the Orders issued by Sir Richard Mayne in reference to the access of Members to the Houses of Parliament, which will clear up the misapprehension existing on the subject. The first extract is this—

“No carriage or vehicle of any sort is to be allowed to pass between Charing Cross and the Houses of Parliament from the hours of 11 a.m. until 4 p.m., except the carriages of Peers and Members of the House of Commons, or those of persons having tickets of admission to the Houses of Parliament, or of persons going to any house between Charing Cross and Abingdon Street. The carriages of persons having tickets of admission to the Houses of Parliament, or those going to any house between Charing Cross and the Houses of Parliament, may pass until 1 p.m., and the carriages of Peers or Members of Parliament may pass until the arrival of the procession of Her Majesty at the Horse Guards, after which hour no carriages are to be permitted to pass between Charing Cross and Abingdon Street until Her Majesty has passed through Whitehall on returning from opening Parliament.”

Hon. Members are mistaken, therefore, in supposing that any Order was given that Members of Parliament should be stopped. If any Member was required to alight from his carriage and walk through the mud, contrary to this Order, I regret it very much. But, there was also an Order issued with regard to the approach over Westminster Bridge. This particular Order directs that—

“Every possible facility is to be given to the carriages of Peers and Members of the House of Commons in proceeding to and leaving the Houses of Parliament.”

The police had strict injunctions to act upon these Orders. If they mistook their instructions, and if any Member of Parliament was put to inconvenience, all I can say, as I have said before, is that I extremely regret it. One word with regard to the crowd of which the hon. Gentleman opposite complains. This year there was an unusual crowd between the Houses of Parliament and Parliament Street, partly in consequence of the works there. The hoarding raised is one necessary for the works, and temporary inconvenience is thereby occasioned. The approaches from Victoria Street and the end of Bridge Street are closed, and on Tuesday the foot passengers collected in such crowds between Parliament Street and Westminster Bridge, that it was hardly in the power of the police to keep a passage clear. This is the explanation which I have to offer. If the hon. Gentleman opposite has any further complaint to make, I shall be happy to inquire into it. With reference to his last observation, that instructions should be given in future to prevent inconvenience to Members of Parliament, I may say that such instructions shall certainly be given, and that any additional precaution which may tend to prevent inconvenience shall be taken.

INDIA—INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether any and what arrangements have been made to present to Parliament the Indian Accounts at the commencement of the Session; and, whether he intends to adhere to the practice hitherto adopted of bringing forward the Indian Budget in the last week of the Session of Parliament?

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: Orders were issued by Lord de Grey for the preparation of the Indian financial accounts in conformity with the English financial accounts up to the 31st of March. Till very recently I imagined that the accounts would be presented this year under that order; but I have received a telegram within the last few days stating that it could not be done until next year. The bringing forward the Indian Budget, as the hon. Gentleman well knows, does not depend on the time at which the accounts are laid upon the table, but on the business of the House with respect to other matters. In future Indian accounts are to be made, like the English accounts, up to the 31st of March.

H.M.S. "GANNET" AND THE "AROUCA." QUESTION.

MR. LAMONT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Captain of Her Majesty's ship Gannet refused or delayed to proceed to the assistance of a Scotch merchant vessel, called the Arouca of Glasgow, in distress off the Island of Trinidad in the month of November last; whether it is true that a French steamer did actually render the required assistance to the distressed vessel while the Gannet lay at anchor; and, whether he will object to lay upon the table of the House any Papers which he may have received relating to the subject?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: No official information has reached the Admiralty on the subject of the hon. Member's Questions. I understand there was a statement made on the subject in a Trinidad newspaper, which I have not seen. If there was a statement relative to this complaint in that paper, I have little doubt that the circumstance will have been brought under the notice of the naval Commander-in-Chief of the Station; and I think it probable that by the next mail I shall receive information on the subject. If so, I shall be able to communicate it; and, in any case, if the hon. Gentleman desires it, I shall be happy to make inquiry on the subject.

Mr. J. B. Smith

SEIZURE OF THE "TORNADO" BY THE SPANISH AUTHORITIES.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the seizure by the Spanish Authorities of an English Steam Vessel, called the Tornado, on the high seas, in August last, and to the imprisonment and trial of the crew; and, if so, whether the Government has taken any steps to ascertain if the capture is lawful; if the representations concerning the harsh treatment of the men are well founded or not; and if there is any probability of their being soon released and sent home to this Country?

LORD STANLEY: Ever since the capture of the Tornado in August last the case has occupied the careful and anxious consideration of the Government. We have watched it in all its stages, and we have been in frequent, I may say, almost continual communication upon it with the Law Officers of the Crown. According to the well-understood rule of International Law, we had no right to object to the trial of the vessel taking place before a Spanish Prize Court; but we did remonstrate strenuously, and more than once, against what appeared to us to be the unreasonable length of time occupied in the preliminary investigation. Within the last few weeks we have had all the proceedings before us. Acting under legal advice, we have found ourselves authorized and compelled to protest against the illegal and informal character of some of the proceedings of that Court; that protest has only very lately been received by the Spanish Government, and I am not yet able to say what the result of it will be. With regard to the treatment of the men, and generally with regard to details, I think the best answer I can give to the hon. Member will be to ask him to wait a few days, when all the papers relating to the transaction will be laid before the House.

SUPPLY—QUEEN'S SPEECH.

QUEEN'S SPEECH considered.

Motion, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty:" — Committee thereupon To-morrow.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in asking for leave to introduce a Bill to make better provision for the arrangements of the affairs of Railway Companies unable to meet their engagements, said: I think the House will not be surprised that the position of the railway companies in this country should have attracted the attention of Her Majesty's Government. In point of fact, there are few questions which have been more before the public of late than the embarrassed position of some of our railway companies—especially the embarrassed position of one of them. Many important questions affecting the future position of railways and the relations of the companies and the State may, at the proper time, engage the attention of Parliament, and to these it will be right that the Government should by-and-bye draw attention; but I think that we are not at the present moment ripe for the consideration of many of these questions, because the Royal Commission which was appointed a short time since to consider the important points in our railway system is still sitting, and has not yet presented its Report. I understand, however, that it is nearly completed, and when it is presented to the House it will, of course, be the duty of the Government to take it into serious consideration, and they may think it their duty, upon the recommendations contained in that Report, to make proposals to this House, which it is now, of course, quite impossible to anticipate. I do not, then, think that this is the proper time for considering many of the questions which affect railways, and to which public attention has been directed; but there is one urgent question, of great magnitude, to which we think it is desirable the attention of Parliament should be directed, and that is the question of the arrangements that shall be made in the case of railway companies which are unfortunately unable to meet their engagements. The Government has thought it desirable to bring their proposal before the House at the commencement of the Session—partly because they wish that the House should have an early opportunity of considering the views they have to submit to it, and partly because of the actual case of certain railway companies who are now in a position of some difficulty. There is nothing in what I shall say to the House, or in the plan which I shall have to propose, which will necessarily interfere with any arrangements now pending; but it is possible that after the views of the Government have been stated upon this subject, and when the opinion of the House has been taken on the course that ought to be pursued with regard to insolvent railway companies, those views and opinions may have some bearing on the proceedings of companies which are now coming before Parliament with reference to arrangements. It is quite unnecessary that I should enlarge upon the importance to the public of an inquiry into this question; but I wish, in opening the discussion, to find some safe ground to start from, and some principle I can take as my guide on the question we have to consider. The ground I start from is this—that the matter is one of public interest, and that the principle on which we ought to proceed in any suggestions we may have to offer for the solution of the difficulties in which railway companies find, or may find themselves, should be that of an adherence to the public interest. We must look on railways as undertakings which have been specially favoured by Parliament—not for the sake of the persons who undertake to construct them—not for the sake of the shareholders, the creditors, or any other class of persons interested in them, but as undertakings to which Parliament has afforded great facilities, because they were considered to be of importance to the communication of the country, and for various public purposes, to which I need not enter into detail; and therefore Parliament has a right to say, "We will take care that these undertakings which we have encouraged, and to which we have granted such facilities, shall really be of advantage to the public," and if we perceive, in the course of the undertaking, that the circumstances of the company will not enable it to carry on its undertakings beneficially for the public and consistently with public security, then I think Parliament has a right to come forward and say, we will endeavour to remedy those evils; and whilst we are prepared to give all due attention and consideration to the rights of individuals, we have a right to demand that some arrangement shall be made for securing the rights of the public. If we start on this principle, then, I think there will be very little difficulty in applying it to the case of a railway company in such a state of financial embarrassment as to be unable to properly conduct its business. This is a matter which affects not only the public convenience but the public safety; and to these ends it is essential that railways should be in the hands of companies possessed of sufficient funds to carry them on in a proper way, to supply the proper and necessary appliances for working, to keep the permanent way in proper and substantial repair, and provide those train services and other facilities which the public have a right to expect. When, however, we find that a railway company is in a position of insolvency, and is unable to meet its engagements, Parliament is entitled to say, on behalf of the public, that this company ought, in some way or another, to give up the task which it is unable to accomplish to other hands who are able to so. When I use the expression that such railways should give up the task to more competent hands, I do not necessarily mean that the existing railway companies should sell their railways to some stranger or third party, because the object may be accomplished by such a re-arrangement of their affairs as would render them just as competent to carry on their undertakings as any new companies founded on a sounder basis. All I now contend for is that it is our duty to see, if a railway company cannot satisfactorily work its railway, that some provision should be made for placing it in the hands of those who can. Having got so far as that in the consideration of the matter which I am endeavouring to lay before the House, I find that I am met with difficulties on the side of the law. As the law stands it is not possible—at all events, in the case of unwilling companies—to force anything on them in the nature of an act of bankruptcy, and it is not possible to compel them to place their affairs in the hands of those who are able and willing to work the lines for them. Railways are expressly and deliberately excepted from the law applicable to all other companies, under which other companies may be made bankrupt when unable to meet their engagements; and although railway companies who choose to register under the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act may be wound up under that Act, even in that case it would be of necessity an imperfect proceeding, for there is no authority which would have power to sell the railway or to make any arrangement

as is made in the case of other undertakings, or to transfer it to other hands. For that purpose it is necessary that the railway company should come to Parliament. Now, if that is the state of the law, we must look at it not only as a matter of fact, but we must look on it as being an incident of the policy on which the law is founded. It is not a mere omission on the part of the Legislature to put them on the same footing as other companies; railway companies are expressly and deliberately excepted by the Legislature on the ground that their undertakings, being of a public character, are on a different footing as regards the public from private undertakings, which are carried on for the benefit of the individuals who carry them on. If a company, for instance, carrying on a cotton-mill, should be found unable to carry on its affairs satisfactorily, it may be made bankrupt, and the mill sold; but whether the concern be carried on, or the mill pulled down, is of no direct or immediate interest to the public. But in the case of a railway company the public have a great interest in what becomes of the line; in fact, they have more interest in what becomes of the line than in what becomes of the company. Parliament, therefore, may fairly say to such a company, "When we gave you the power to make this line, we did not at the same time empower you to transfer it to whom you pleased; we allowed you to work, but not to sell it; and if your affairs go wrong and you are obliged to sell, we must have a voice in the disposal of the line." When we consider the public importance of railways, the means they afford of communication throughout the country, and the relation which one railway system bears to another, the question who is to work a railway, in whose possession it is to be, and upon what conditions it shall work—all these are points of public policy, not merely of private interest. The case, therefore, stands thus:—Although it is of importance that an insolvent railway company should be relieved from duties which it is not able to perform, and that provision should be made for the better performance of those duties, the existing law supplies no means of accomplishing such an object without, first of all, the consent of the company, and its registration and winding-up under the Joint Stock Companies Act; and, in the next place, a private Act of Parliament permitting the sale of the railway. That being the case, we have to consider in what way we are to deal with those companies which may unfortunately bring themselves into this position. The first suggestion might be that you should introduce into your legislation provisions for enabling such companies to be wound up adversely in the Court of Chancery. But, if you do that, it will be necessary to adopt provisions directing the mode in which the railway is to be disposed of, and also provisions to meet the other circumstances of the case. This must be either by some general Act applicable to every case, or the provisions may be settled by some other authority than that of Parliament. The most obvious that suggests itself is the Court of Chancery, and that that Court, or any other Court in which the company may be wound up, should have the power to prepare a scheme for the disposal of the railway and the property of the company. But if you were to give the Court of Chancery this power there is no doubt that Parliament would insist that the scheme should not be adopted and carried into effect upon the sole authority of the Court of Chancery, but should be brought before the House for its approval or disapproval of the proposed scheme. It is out of the question to suppose that Parliament will place in the Court of Chancery, or any other Court, the power of making a final arrangement of such a matter. With every respect for the Court of Chancery, I do not think the Court is competent to execute such functions. No doubt that Court, when it came to prepare a scheme, would contrive in some way to do that which it considered best for all parties interested in the railway, and as between shareholders and debenture-holders and other creditors, would be able to prepare as just and equitable a scheme as could be devised; but when it became necessary to introduce provisions for the interests of the public, then, I think, a Court of Law would not be the best instrument for framing such a scheme. Again, the idea of introducing into a general Act of Parliament all the clauses and provisions necessary to meet the case of railways in embarrassed circumstances is out of the question. The provisions contained in any such Act must be extremely elaborate to meet every possible variety of case that can be conceived, and must be accompanied with guards and checks of every conceivable description, and upon every one of those provisions questions would arise which would lead to doubts, disputes, and differences. I hardly think it possible that such a Bill could be carried through Parliament; and even if it were, I think it is almost certain that when it came to be worked, many cases would be found to have been omitted, and new cases would constantly arise for which no provision had been, or could possibly have been, made. We must therefore dismiss the idea either of dealing with the matter through the Court of Chancery, or of embodying provisions in a general Act of Parliament which should be satisfactory. Various suggestions have been made at different times, and there is one class of suggestions to which I think I must refer, because great prominence has been given to it. It has been said by certain persons interested, and by some of very great authority, that the matter ought really to be dealt with with reference especially, if not exclusively, to the rights and claims of the debenture-holders; that, in point of fact, they ought to be regarded as the mortgagees of the line, and that when a railway company is unable to pay the interest on its debenture debt, or to meet the claim of its debenture-holders for principal and interest, that they ought to have the right to foreclose, as it were, and take the line into their own hands. Now, looking to the public interest, I do not think any such arrangement can be sanctioned. The question of whether debenture-holders do or do not possess the rights of mortgagees over a railway is a question which has been more or less debated, and was up to a certain time doubtful; but the recent decision of Lord Justice Cairns, about ten days ago, has determined that debenture-holders are not in the position of mortgagees, that they have no power to take precedence of other creditors or to foreclose upon the land and take the whole concern. Therefore, I do not think that the claim of the debenture-holders has been established to such a point as to render it incumbent on Parliament, in making arrangements for the affairs of embarrassed companies, to treat theirs as the one great interest to be considered to the exclusion of all others, and to give them, as a matter of right, at whatever cost of public convenience, the management of concerns of such magnitude. We are not to look upon the question as a case in which the debenture-holders have a right to seize the line when it does not pay; but we are free to look upon it from the public point of view, and consider what arrangements will be most expedient for the public interest. We must, in the first instance, regard these concerns, which have been sanctioned by Parliament for public purposes, as a whole, and look to the public interest first; and then we must endeavour to deal with the different classes engaged in the undertaking, in one shape or another, with reference to the rights of those parties. Those rights are so important that it is desirable that they should be ascertained by proper tribunals; and in any arrangement we make we should give due weight to them. But looking at this as a matter of public interest, when we see a concern which cannot be carried on as we expected it should be when we sanctioned it, we have a right to see how the management of the line can be so rearranged that the undertaking can be carried on in a proper manner. Now, one can hardly conceive a more unsatisfactory way of carrying on a line than by putting it into the hands of a body of debenture-holders. They confessedly are a class who are not qualified for the management of commercial transactions. I do not speak of every debenture-holder, but of the body. They are a class of men, and not unfrequently women, who do not desire to undertake the responsibility of the management of a great undertaking, who will not be well qualified to elect Directors, or to keep them in check by attending meetings; but who, having money to invest, desire to lend it on what they believe to be good security. Now if you suddenly throw on a class of persons like this the management of the railway which others much better qualified had been unable to manage successfully, you are more likely to add to the inefficiency of the conduct of the line than to restore it to efficiency. I therefore set aside all question of allowing the debenture-holders to take the management themselves. Then there is another proposal. Supposing the case that the debenture-holders are allowed to step in and take the management and control, it is thought by some that they should not be allowed to do so uncontrolled, but that the Government should assist them in the management. Two proposals have been made with regard to the action of the Government in the matter, and I desire to say a few words upon this point, because rumours, as if from authority, have got afloat pointing to courses which the Government would never think of following. One of these suggestions is that the Government should come forward, leaving all other matters exactly as they are, and take the debentures of involved railways on itself, that it should undertake to pay off the debenture-holders and become creditors of the companies in their place. As to such a proposal, or anything in that nature, I venture to say it is one that Parliament could not contemplate for a moment. I do not elaborate this point as it has been elaborated in the public press and elsewhere; but it seems to me that the result of all such propositions is that the Government is to constitute itself into a great Finance Company, to undertake on the strength of its credit to come forward and help those whose credit is not so good as their own; and it is said that the Government being able probably to borrow at the rate of 3½ per cent for the purpose of lending at 5 or 6 per cent, might realize a large profit. Against all such proposals I venture to enter my protest. I am satisfied that it would be an unwise and improvident thing on the part of the State to lend itself to any operation of that kind. We have got enough to do with the management of our own Debt, without undertaking to add largely to it by paying off the debts of other persons with a view to reap the benefit of such profit as may be represented by the difference of the credit of the railway companies and that of the State. A proposal a little less objectionable would be for the Government to take all the debentures of all the companies, and not only those of the bad ones. This would be rather better than that it should take up the bad bargains only. But I think this also is out of the question. Then there is a proposal of a much larger character—that the Government should not only undertake the debenture debt, but also take the railways themselves; and for this undoubtedly there is more to be said—because, to take the debenture debt without the railways would be to take an obligation on ourselves without taking power to interfere with the management of the railways, and we should so run great risks without the power of protecting ourselves; but to take the railways themselves would be a different matter, because we should have the control, and might be able to conduct them with profit. But this is not the moment to consider that question—it is before the Royal Commission on Railways, and whatever their Report may be—of which I am quite ignorant—it will receive due attention. I must however say, that if it should point to any such conclusion as that we should take the railways, that matter would require the most serious and careful consideration before it could be even entertained. I do not say for a moment it should be entertained; but I wish to distinguish it from the mere taking the debentures, which would certainly be most objectionable. Setting this aside, and setting aside any proposal in the nature of working a line by Government interference, I ask, how are we to deal with the difficulty we have to meet? I have endeavoured to show, in the first place, that in the interest of the public, some means should be found of transferring railways from insolvent to solvent management; that this cannot be done solely by the intervention of the Court of Chancery; that the necessary provisions cannot be made by any general Act of Parliament; and I have indicated that it is not desirable for the State to take the railways or their debts on itself. I have also endeavoured to show that Parliament would not be disposed to allow the arrangements of our railway companies to go entirely out of its control. Therefore, as provision cannot be made by a general Act, there must be a special Act of Parliament in each individual case, framed according to the circumstances. Hon. Members will perhaps say that the end of all this long statement is, that things are to go on as they are—that at present Private Bills are to be introduced to meet each case as it arises. That is not exactly our proposal. The difficulty of proceeding by Private Bills on the present footing is that a Private Bill can only be promoted, or only is promoted, by the company itself; and there is no means of compelling a company that is unwilling to do so to wind up its affairs. Moreover, in the case of Private Bills only certain persons have such an interest as gives them a locus standi before the Committee, and the interest which the general public has, although very great, would hardly entitle it to be represented. Then in Private Bill legislation we have much uncertainty to deal with, because the decisions of the Committees in one Session are often overruled by those who succeed them in the next, and there is the possibility of the rules laid down by one House of Parliament being disregarded by the other. All these difficulties have induced Her Majesty's Government to try if we cannot find a better mode of dealing with these questions. I think there may be. I think that by calling in the aid of the Executive Government for certain purposes you may provide a better mode of meeting these cases. We propose, then, that the Executive Government—through that Department of it which is more particularly concerned, the Board of Trade—should, in the first instance, prepare the schemes which shall be laid before Parliament in the form of Bills, and should take charge of them as Public Bills, and carry them through Parliament. The proposal is that when a company is in a state of financial embarrassment, when it is unable to pay the interest or principal of its debentures, when there is an execution issued against it and there are no funds to satisfy the demands of its creditors, or when the traffic is suspended and it is not able to carry on its business—contingencies which are fully set forth in the Bill—it shall be lawful for a certain number of the creditors or shareholders of the company to present a petition to the Board of Trade praying that the Board will order an investigation into the circumstances of the company. On that a communication will be made to the Directors of the company, and a certain limited time allowed them in which to offer objections to that course of proceeding; after which the Board of Trade, if satisfied that there is a prima facie case for inquiry, will appoint one or more inspectors. These are to be persons competent from their financial and legal ability to investigate the whole position of the company, and will be armed with the power to call witnesses and collect evidence, so as to effect a complete and satisfactory investigation. They will then prepare a scheme for the settlement of the company's affairs, for which the Board of Trade will make itself responsible, and which it will introduce into Parliament. Next comes the question how the Bill shall be dealt with by the Legislature; and it being one great object of the plan to insure as far as possible uniformity of decision and a reduction of expense, it is proposed that instead of such a Bill being separately considered by Committees of each House of Parliament, it shall be introduced simultaneously into both Houses, and that after passing a second reading in each it shall, in the event of opposition from interested parties, be referred to a Joint Committee, appointed by the two Houses, under Standing Orders to be framed for that purpose. That Committee will deal with it in the same way that Private Bills are now dealt with, and the Bill being introduced by the President of the Board of Trade, will be carried through by him upon public grounds—so that he will be interested in raising questions before the Committee which the promoters or opponents of Private Bills are not necessarily interested in considering. A means will thus be provided for dealing with each special case upon its own particular circumstances, through a careful examination of its merits by persons who, selected in the first instance for their competency, will, in process of time, acquire a great deal of experience, and who will not be hampered by formal rules of evidence from obtaining information in the freest possible manner. With regard to the Joint Committee, I venture, though with some diffidence, to suggest that the Standing Orders should secure its appointment upon a very careful footing, and that the two Houses should be empowered, if they think fit, to associate with the Committee some of the Referees to whom Private Bills were now referred. This, however, is a matter of detail, and is not essential to the scheme, that which is essential being a joint inquiry by both Houses, with a view to avoid expense and uncertainty. I think Parliament may be satisfied with this—and, indeed, I am inclined to think that it would be a great improvement on the mode of conducting Private Business were the principle of Joint Committees carried still further. I do not wish, however, to travel beyond the limits of the present measure, and therefore only suggest that course as advisable in the case with which we now have to deal. In the event of the inspectors finding that the requisite arrangement is within the terms of an existing Act of Parliament, there is a clause providing that they may, with the assent of three-fifths of the shareholders, debenture-holders, and other persons interested, prepare a scheme and submit it to Her Majesty for confirmation by an Order in Council. I have now stated the leading features of the Bill, which will be in the hands of hon. Members in a day or two, and I trust that at no distant period it may be considered by the House, the Committee upon it being deferred, if thought desirable, for a longer time than usual, in order that the details of the scheme may be fully examined. I hope that the proposal will be found to obviate some of the difficulties now experienced owing to the present state of the law, which renders companies, practically insolvent, unable to come to any arrangement, and drives them to seek relief in all directions, each class standing upon its exclusive rights, and the assets being wasted in internal disputes. I believe that the plan which I have sketched out will not only provide a simple and effective method of dealing with these difficulties as they arise, but will, to some extent, prevent their occurrence, because the knowledge that the intervention of the Board of Trade may be invoked will act as a check upon Directors, and also as an encouragement to shareholders to take an interest in the arrangement. Vexatious and frequent appeals are, of course, to be deprecated. This is the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, which I now ask leave to present in the shape of a Bill.

Moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the arrangement of the affairs of Railway Companies unable to meet their engagements."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. WATKIN said, he did not intend to oppose the introduction of the measure, but he should have desired to have the Bill before them, because it was very difficult to judge of its operation by the essay they had just heard from the right hon. Baronet. He submitted, however, that though there was a case for legislation of some kind, the right hon. Baronet had not made out a case for the introduction of the measure which he proposed. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that Parliament ought not to interfere with the concerns of these joint-stock companies except in the interest of the public, and that interest, his argument led them to infer, consisted in the facility and safety of locomotion; but he had not adduced a single case in which even the unsound companies had failed to carry on the traffic. He therefore ventured to think that the matter might be left to the ordinary common sense and self-interest of the persons interested in these concerns, and that there was no need of the intervention of Parliament by general measures. The cases were exceptional, and called for exceptional legislation, each case upon its own merits. General legislation was not needed, and to propose it would create doubt and distrust, and needlessly damage the credit of sound companies which, under general measures, would be classed with the unsound. The right hon. Baronet promised, at the close of last Session, to lay before the House an explanation of the financial collapse of last spring. Now, it was admitted that one cause of the suffering then experienced was the sanction given by Parliament during the last three or four years to various wasteful schemes for the expenditure of the national capital. Those unsound undertakings, it should be remembered, had been authorized by Parliament; and though, no doubt, it was not the province of the Legislature to prevent people from throwing away their money—though, no doubt, a man was at liberty to pull down his house and make it a heap of rubbish, or, provided he did not insure it, to scuttle his ship—Parliament surely ought not to facilitate such operations. The expenditure of a large amount of labour, and the consequent wasting of the national resources in unremunerative schemes, was a loss to the nation, though the capital belonged in the separate sense to individuals. £450,000,000 had been invested in railways in the United Kingdom; but the total amount of capital invested in these unsound undertakings—the first being in the South of Ireland, next some in Wales, and lastly the London, Chatham, and Dover—did not comprise more than a tithe of that total. By these failures the public had not been so far damaged; and he (Mr. Watkin) said that Parliament should leave to the promoters of the undertakings themselves to present schemes for managing their own affairs, in their own way, according to the dictates of their own common sense. He (Mr. Watkin) feared that if this Bill were carried it would be the beginning of a departure from the useful principle that the persons who went into these undertakings ought to be allowed to manage their own affairs. It would probably be found that the management of the Board of Trade would not be so good as that of the worst managed of these railways. He feared that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman would only create a false security in the creditors and debenture-holders. Instead of each man inquiring for and relying upon himself, he would be looking on the Board of Trade as an emblem of safety, and relying on it as a surety against loss. The pith of the whole question was to be found in this—what was at the moment required was not the interference of the Board of Trade, but merely a short provision in a general Act of Parliament for the inviolability and perfect security of railway debentures—the keystone of that railway system which, with all its shortcomings, had done so much for the well-being and prosperity of the country. What was the present position of the question? The right hon. Gentleman said that a recent legal decision had rendered it doubtful whether a debenture was a mortgage, whether a debenture-holder had a right to sell; and then the right hon. Gentleman enunciated a most dangerous principle in stating that the railway mortgagee ought not to be allowed to sell the security on which his money had been advanced. Such a principle would sap the foundation of the whole mortgage property of the country, and the feeling of doubt and insecurity created would raise the rate of interest upon all mortgages. There never was a more dangerous principle laid down by a Minister in this country than to say that the mortgagee should not be able to sell the security on which his money had been obtained in his mortgage. In Transatlantic countries the railway debenture was a mortgage, not on the tolls only, but on the engines, plant, and the whole property of the undertaking. What was wanted was to make a railway debenture really a mortgage. If that were done, he believed there would be found in the most rotten of these concerns a core of soundness which would pull the enterprise at last through in the interest of the public. A very short, simple measure to make the debenture inviolable would be safe and useful. The Bill of the Government would be useless and mischievous.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would be sorry to give any off-hand opinion on the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, which was somewhat complicated, and must contain many details which they could not usefully discuss until they had the Bill before them. But he had heard with great pleasure that one part of his plan was to refer any Railway winding-up Bill, brought in as proposed under the auspices of the Board of Trade, to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament. They had a Joint Committee two or three Sessions ago on Metropolitan Railways, and their experience on that occasion justified Parliament in carrying the principle of these Committees still further. The double inquiry had been a source of constant complaint, and it had been felt that the evidence on Railway Bills might be given once for both Houses, and that one inquiry would serve all the purposes of legislation. The Committee on Private Bill Legislation, which sat two or three years ago, were of opinion that this system of Joint Committees might be adopted generally for all cases of Railway and Private Bills. Perhaps that would be going too far at present; but, at any rate, he was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to carry the principle a step further. With regard to the scheme itself, what struck his mind most was that the Board of Trade would be called upon to exercise most important judicial functions. Under the proposed scheme creditors might come forward and petition the Board of Trade that a certain company should be wound up. The Board of Trade would of course hear the parties who objected to the company being wound up and made bankrupt. That was a most important function to be committed to a public Department; but it appeared more difficult still when they considered that the Board would have to decide upon the equitable rights of the debenture-holders, the preference stock holders, and the ordinary creditors. These were judicial operations well suited for the Court of Chancery; but unless performed under very competent and proper advice, they were not suited to a Department like the Board of Trade. He would not, however, speak unfavourably of any part of the scheme until he knew more of it; but he could not sit down without saying that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken a most useful task in endeavouring, so far as he could, to enable persons to get out of their unfortunate difficulties in connection with railways. He certainly agreed that the public had a primary interest beyond all other interests, and it was that of enabling the railway communications of the country to be kept open. The public interest was, in fact, that the traffic in passengers and goods should be carried on with safety and punctuality; but the public had no direct interest in the question whether debenture-holders got their full interest or shareholders their dividends, though Parliament was bound to provide a mode by which all claims on a railway company can be equitably arranged, and, at the same time, securing that the railways themselves should not be liable to be stopped in their use to the public. Debentures and shares were matters of speculation on the part of debenture-holders when they lent their money, and of shareholders when they embarked their capital; but, undoubtedly, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the Government and the public had a direct interest in seeing that railways, which had become the high roads of the country, should be kept open, and that the traffic upon them should be conducted with safety and regularity.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he quite agreed with his right hon. Friend (Mr. Milner Gibson) that it was premature to express an opinion on the measure itself; but he could not think it premature to express an opinion with respect to the principle upon which it was said to be based. Having a most acute sense of the extreme importance and urgency of the question, he had heard the statement of the President of the Board of Trade with feelings of the most profound disappointment. The measure appeared to him to be necessarily inadequate to deal with the real evil, and based upon principles wholly insufficient to meet the actual difficulties of the case. It was very true that the public had an important interest in the maintenance of these great lines of communication; but he could not but express his entire dissent from the view—if it were the view—of the right hon. Gentleman that Parliament had no duty to discharge with regard to the private interests, especially of the creditors, of these great concerns. [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE was understood to intimate his dissent.] He did not imagine that the right hon. Gentleman had said so; but, at all events, the Bill did not take that broad and general view of the rights of creditors and the proper mode of providing for their payment which seemed to be imperatively required, and which could not possibly be provided for by this sort of special piecemeal legislation through the Board of Trade and both Houses of Parliament in each particular case. There should be a general law securing to the creditors of a railway and all other companies the payment of their debts to the extent of the means of the company on settled principles to be administered by the Courts of Law. He did say that the state of things lately disclosed in that respect was scandalous. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that, under the existing Acts of Parliament, railway companies, either by registering themselves or otherwise, could be wound up. This, however, was quite certain—that judgment creditors might pull to pieces by private and separate executions all that was absolutely necessary to enable the company to go on—because no tolls could be earned, no profits could be derived, and the public traffic could not be provided for without the rolling stock. At the present moment, if a company were insolvent, each individual judgment creditor, going for his own separate interest, might pull to pieces the plant and rolling stock of the concern. That was an imminent practical danger; and then what would happen? In all other cases of winding-up or bankruptcy, the available assets were distributed rateably among the creditors—but no such machinery was applicable to this particular case; and with regard to the unfortunate debenture-holders, whom Parliament had certainly led to suppose that they had got security under Acts of the Legislature, it had been lately determined—and, no doubt, correctly—that they had no mortgage on the permanent way or on the rolling stock; that they had no power, and that nobody had power, to supersede the management of the company; and that their sole right, if there were profits, was to get their interest paid out of those profits. But unless a railway could be carried on, and the general interests of the creditors were provided for by an administration for their common benefit, in the special case of insolvency which the Bill proposed to deal with, it was utterly impossible there could be any profits whatever; and the enormous amount of property involved in railway debentures in the kingdom would be exposed to daily and hourly risk. Let him suppose that the procedure proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite was adopted, that a company was in this state, and that people went to the Board of Trade to settle a scheme. As his right hon. Friend (Mr. Milner Gibson) had justly said, if the Board of Trade was to settle a scheme for the re-constitution of a company, so as to provide for the different rights of the different classes of creditors, he did not see how it could possibly do that except by the exercise of judicial functions. Take the case of the unfortunate company, the state of whose affairs had led to these questions—the London, Chatham, and Dover Company. That Company had, by their legislation—they must never forget that—been cut up into a great number of sections, and parcelled out among different classes of creditors and persons who had been induced to lend their money. It was in utter confusion. Was the Board of Trade to disentangle that mass of complication and confusion; or, if not to disentangle it, could it propose new legislation with due security for the proper maintenance of the rights of all those various classes of creditors? It seemed to him to be totally impossible for the Board of Trade to do that. Judicial machinery was absolutely necessary for the purpose; and the present judicial machinery was confessedly inadequate to accomplish it. He ventured to think, if he understood the right hon. Baronet's explanation, that his proposal in that respect would be a most inexpedient one; for, whatever else might be desirable, they wanted a Bill that should give to the Courts of Justice that large and comprehensive power of doing justice to all the creditors of these companies in case of insolvency, which the Court of Chancery and Court of Bankruptcy had in regard to any other joint-stock company.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, he had to apologize to the House, and confess that when he undertook to bring in this Bill he had some doubts as to his own power of fully explaining its nature. He agreed in the remark which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond, that there were disadvantages in discussing Bills before they were in the hands of Members, because the only impression which the House could possibly derive of their provisions must be gathered from the explanation—often a very imperfect one—of the Member bringing them in, who, being naturally hampered by his desire not to trespass too long on the time of the House, sometimes omitted points which ought to be mentioned. If, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Roundell Palmer) had had the Bill in his hands he would have seen that it was not quite open to the objections which, upon the imperfect statement he had given of its provisions, might fairly be taken to it. He quite admitted that it would be extremely difficult for the Board of Trade to exercise the functions which the Bill proposed to vest in it. There would, no doubt, be many judicial questions raised which the Board of Trade would not be competent to settle for itself. But it was intended to insert in the measure a clause giving power to the inspectors of the Board of Trade to refer questions of a delicate legal character to the Courts of Law, to be decided by an issue which would be properly tried with regard to the rights of particular classes of creditors. That was a point on which he felt himself incompetent to speak, because it was one of a technical nature; but he had drawn the attention of the gentleman who had charge of the framing of the Bill to it, and desired him to prepare a clause, or clauses, to meet that difficulty, and enable judicial decisions to be taken in those cases in which they might be absolutely necessary. He could not, of course, say whether these clauses would be satisfactory. He would only observe that the point was one which had not been overlooked, and when the hon. and learned Member had the Bill before him, it would be seen whether the clauses were sufficient for the purpose. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said, very truly, that what they had to do was to protect a company against the suspension of its operations. It was proposed to introduce a clause into the Bill which would prevent the seizure of the rolling stock, or any proceeding that would interfere with the carrying on of the railway. The hon. and learned Gentleman, having graphically described the state of confusion which existed in the case of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, asked whether the Board of Trade would find its way through all that labyrinth? Certainly, he was not going to say that it would be able to do that or absolutely to settle all those questions; but it would be a great improvement in the present state of things, when all these various classes of persons were fighting together and wasting their time and money without any mediator or arbitrator at all between them—it would be of great advantage if they provided an arbitrator who might be competent, and whose decision, if he were not competent, would not be final, but would have to come before Parliament. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) said all that was wanted was that they should protect debentures. He did not think that was all they had to do; but he would not enter into that controversy, neither would he discuss the bearings of that question upon the commercial distress of last year. He would only ask the House kindly to allow him to introduce the Bill, and to suspend its judgment upon its details until it had seen them.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to make better provision for the arrangement of the affairs of Railway Companies unable to meet their engagements, ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Mr. CAVE, and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL.

SHIPPING LOCAL DUES BILL.

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

(In the Committee.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE rose to propose that—

“The Chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill for the Abolition of certain Exemptions from Local Dues on Shipping and on Goods carried in Ships.”

It would, he said, be convenient that he should defer, as far as possible, any discussion on the Bill which it was sought to introduce until it was in print; but he might then briefly state that last year a law was passed in France, admitting foreign ships to very great advantages, which they had not heretofore enjoyed in French ports, but this privilege was limited to the vessels of those countries which treated French ships with perfect reciprocity. The nature of the new French law was this, that it abolished the tonnage dues which weighed heavily on ships entering French ports, but retained power for the Emperor to re-impose them upon the ships of countries which did not “grant reciprocity to the French Mercantile Marine.” The French Government had communicated to the British Government its wish that the benefits of this law might be shared by British ships; but stated, that for this purpose it was necessary that the British Government should abolish those exemptions from local dues in respect of British ships which were still enjoyed by a small number of persons in our seaports. These exemptions were now very limited, and of infinitesimal value; and it had always been contended on our side that they were not, strictly speaking, any breach of reciprocity, inasmuch as the dues in question were not levied on French or foreign ships in particular, but also on British ships. The French, however, argued that that was not satisfactory to them, and that, in point of fact, an Englishman might gain an exemption from some of those dues, whereas a Frenchman never could. In that state of the case, it was thought by Her Majesty's Government desirable to extinguish the remaining exemptions of that character; and the French Government had very handsomely accepted the intimation of the Government's intention to submit a Bill to Parliament; and the Emperor, although he had re-imposed the restrictions upon American ships, abstained from doing so with regard to British ships, until he ascertained whether Parliament would pass the proposed Bill. The Bill provided that the local exemptions, which are now enjoyed by very few persons, should be abolished within a very limited time, and that compensation to the persons who enjoyed them should be made—not, of course, out of any Imperial or public funds, but out of those funds which would profit directly by their abolition—namely, the funds of the harbour or other trusts to which the dues in question were payable. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill for the Abolition of certain Exemptions from Local Dues on Shipping and on Goods carried in Ships.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOKE, Mr. CAVE, and Mr. HUNT.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, &c. DECLARATION ABOLITION BILL.

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

(In the Committee.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN rose to move—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish a certain Declaration, commonly called the Declaration against Transubstantiation, Invocation of Saints, and the Sacrifice of the Mass as practised in the Church of Rome; and to render it unnecessary to take, make, or subscribe the same as a qualification for the exercise or enjoyment of any Civil Office, Franchise, or Right."

The hon. and learned Baronet said, that this Bill was almost identical with the one introduced by him last Session, and which the present Home Secretary intimated his desire to support. The Bill passed through all its stages in that House; but it was, unfortunately, thrown out in the other House in the month of July, as the noble Lord at the head of the Government objected to proceeding with it at the late period of the Session at which it came before the House, especially as it was expected that the Royal Commission appointed on the general subject would shortly make their Report, when a more comprehensive measure might be introduced this Session. He believed, however, that the Report had not yet appeared; and he was certainly unwilling that a Declaration, which was so objectionable to a vast number of his fellow-countrymen, should remain on the statute book, and he therefore now moved for leave to introduce the Bill. An additional reason for introducing it at this time was to be found in the reply which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had given to the hon. Member for Sheffield, intimating that the Government had no intention of introducing a Bill on the subject of Oaths this Session.

Resolution moved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish a certain Declaration, commonly called the Declaration against Transubstantiation, Invocation of Saints, and the sacrifice of the Mass as practised in the Church of Rome; and to render it unnecessary to take, make, or subscribe the same as a qualification for the exercise or enjoyment of any Civil Office, Franchise, or Right.—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

MR. WALPOLE said, that the hon. and learned Baronet was perfectly right in stating that when he moved his Bill of last Session he offered to give him his humble support in passing it; for he had no hesitation in saying that, in his opinion, declarations with regard to solemn ceremonies of religion ought not to be made the test upon which offices should be allowed to be accepted or not. He was not prepared to retract a single word now that the further prosecution of the measure was proposed. With reference to the intentions of the Government, what he had stated, in answer to a question put by the hon. Member for Sheffield, was that the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the subject had not yet made their Report, and that until they had done so the Government could make no declaration as to what it would do on the subject. It was certainly not the intention of the Government to continue the unnecessary number of oaths now on the statute book, but they desired to wait for the Report of the Commissioners before they proposed any definite legislative measure on the subject.

MR. NEWDEGATE was understood to express his regret at the intimation given by the Government that they were not prepared to offer any opposition to the Bill.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should be glad to learn whether the Report of the Commissioners would be soon in the hands of Members of the House. He hoped that after it had been presented prompt action would be taken by the Government in relieving persons who had felt scruples of a religious or moral nature against taking oaths and declarations. He would be glad to know when the Report would be ready?

MR. WALPOLE said, he and his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Stanley) were Members of the Oaths Commission; but upon taking Office in the Government they resigned, as they found they would not have time to attend to the duties of the Commission. Under these circumstances, he could not positively answer the question of the hon. Member as to when the Report would be presented, but he would cause inquiries to be made. He might say that before Christmas the Commissioners had made great progress, and he fully expected that the Report would be drawn up at no very distant period.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish a certain Declaration, commonly called the Declaration against Transubstantiation, Invocation of Saints, and the Sacrifice of the Mass as practised in the Church of Rome; and to render it unnecessary to take, make, or subscribe the same as a qualification for the exercise or enjoyment of any Civil Office, Franchise, or Right.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, MR. COGAN, and SIR JOHN GRAY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 6.]

OFFICES AND OATHS BILL.

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

(In the Committee.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN rose to move—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to remove certain Religious Disabilities affecting some of Her Majesty's Subjects, and to amend the Law relating to Oaths of Office."

The hon. and learned Baronet said he did not wish to raise any discussion upon this occasion, as he thought it would be better to discuss the provisions of the Bill upon the second reading. The Bill which he now asked leave to introduce was one which he feared would not meet with the same general support as the last, and no doubt the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, and other hon. Members of the same opinions, would offer to it all the opposition in their power; but he nevertheless trusted to show to the House that it ought to be carried. When he introduced in the last Session his Bill for the abolition of the Declaration regarding Transubstantiation, he said that he had no intention to alter the existing law as to the qualifications for holding certain offices under Government, because he did not consider that such an attempt should be made indirectly or by a side-wind, but openly, so that the House might have a full knowledge of the object proposed. Accordingly he now asked for leave to introduce this Bill, the object of which was to remove certain religious disabilities and open to Roman Catholics certain offices now closed to them. He would remind the House that there were certain offices in Ireland which Roman Catholics could not hold in consequence of the enactments in the Emancipation Act of 1829, and amongst them were those of Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor. The first clause of the Bill would enable Roman Catholics to hold the office of Lord Chancellor and the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In 1859 a Bill was introduced into this House by Lord Athlumney (then Sir William Somerville) and Mr. Herbert, to enable the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland to be held by Roman Catholics, and that Bill was supported by Lord Palmerston, Sir George Lewis, Mr. Cardwell, and other eminent Members of the House. But in consequence of the late period at which the Bill was introduced the opposition that was offered to it proved successful, and it was withdrawn. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, unlike the Lord Chancellor of England, had no ecclesiastical patronage; in fact, he was no more than the highest equity Judge in that country, and there could be no reason why a Roman Catholic should not hold the office. The other office he proposed to open was that of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; nor could he understand why the Emancipation Act excluded Roman Catholics from it. A Roman Catholic might be the Chief Secretary for Ireland; he might be the Prime Minister of England; he might fill any of the Chief Secretaryships of State; but he was not allowed to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It might be said that as the Lord Lieutenant represented Her Majesty—the representative of the Protestant Crown—he must be a Protestant; but it should be remembered that the Governor General of Canada, of India, or of any Australian colony, or of any other dependency of the Crown, might be a Roman Catholic. It was difficult, therefore, to argue with any consistency that a Roman Catholic was disqualified from properly representing Her Majesty in Ireland. It was true that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland enjoyed a good deal of ecclesiastical patronage; but in the event of the office being filled by a Roman Catholic, that patronage could be dispensed by some other person; just as, he presumed, that if the Prime Minister of England were of the Roman Catholic persuasion he would not interfere with the filling up of vacancies in the episcopal bench. The Secretary of State for the Home Department enjoyed large ecclesiastical patronage in Scotland, yet a Roman Catholic could fill the office, though in such a case he would not dispense this particular branch of the patronage attaching to his office. All that he sought by the Bill was to place all the subjects of Her Majesty on perfect religious equality. He did not desire to provide that the Lord Lieutenant or the Lord Chancellor of Ireland should be a Roman Catholic, but only that he might be, if an occasion should arise when it appeared convenient, to give the appointment to a gentleman or nobleman of that persuasion. The next clause of the Bill had for its object to repeal what he must consider as a most miserable clause in the Emancipation Act of 1829—namely, the clause that prevented mayors and other corporate officers who might be Roman Catholics from attending Divine worship in their robes of office, and Judges who might be Roman Catholics from attending Divine worship in their official robes. This enactment was naturally the occasion of ill-feeling in Ireland. It was, in fact, saying that the mayor of a town might be a Roman Catholic, but his robe and chain of office must be Protestant; or a Judge might believe in transubstantiation, but his wig and his gown must agree in the orthodoxy of the Thirty-nine Articles. The time had come when they should put an end to these miserable remnants of the past. When a Protestant mayor was elected for Dublin he went in state to Christ's Church; but when a Roman Catholic was elected, he could not go in state to his place of worship. The third and last provision of the Bill related to the abolition of certain oaths. The House was aware that last Session the Catholic oath question was finally settled, and a uniform oath was adopted, which every Member of Parliament must take in future when he took his seat. But the only persons relieved from what the Legislature proclaimed last Session to be an offensive oath were Members of Parliament; and the old oath had still to be taken by members of corporations, magistrates, professional men, and others in Ireland. What he desired by the third clause was to provide that the oath adopted last Session by the House should be the only one to be used for the future in all cases. These were the simple provisions of the Bill, and he would repeat that he did not wish to raise any discussion upon them at present. He trusted that when the House came to consider the Bill they would see that he asked nothing which was not perfectly reasonable and just.

Resolution moved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to remove certain Religious Disabilities affecting some of Her Majesty's subjects, and to amend the Law relating to Oaths of Office.
—(Sir Colman O'Loghlin.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought that this second Bill very clearly explained the object of the last Bill which the hon. Member had introduced. The Bill for the Abolition of the Declaration regarding Transubstantiation passed that House last Session on the ground that the declaration was simply offensive to Roman Catholics, though he, Mr. Whiteside, and some other hon. Members had endeavoured to impress upon the House that it was merely a disguise for a political object. The other House was, he believed, of that opinion, and rejected the Bill. The proposal before the House was that any office in Ireland might be filled by a Roman Catholic. Though ours was a Protestant monarchy, yet it was proposed that the office of Lord Lieutenant in Ireland—which represented the Queen—might be filled by a Roman Catholic. He would remind the Government that the Protestant subjects of this country attached great importance to the fact that the Crown stood limited to Protestants. That was settled at the Revolution, and was considered by their ancestors, and had ever since been considered, to be one of the safeguards of the country. Their experience taught them that that limitation had proved salutary and wise, and the wisdom of this limitation was exhibited in the increasing prosperity of the country. The hon. and learned Baronet said the dependencies of this country might be presided over by Roman Catholics as Governors. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that there had been instances of that kind; but did the hon. Member mean to say that Ireland was a dependency? He (Mr. Newdegate) thought Ireland was part of the United Kingdom. The hon. and learned Baronet seemed to think that the liberality of the House ought to have no bounds, for year after year these demands were increased. He did not desire on that occasion to enter at large into the question; but he trusted that the Government would remember that they had been hitherto supported by the Church of England and the Protestant opinion of the country, and if they desired hereafter to have that support, they must, at all events, be ready to guard the Protestantism of the Crown, and be ready to secure that Her Majesty should not in the United Kingdom be directly represented by a Roman Catholic. He was willing to grant to his Roman Catholic fellow-subjects everything that could be granted consistently with what experience had shown to be necessary for the maintenance of the freedom of their own religion as well as of ours. The House would do well to consider how this proposal would be looked upon by foreigners who have more experience of Ultramontane tactics than we have in England. Count Montalembert, in writing the Political Future of England, urged the Roman Catholics of this country and their priesthood to claim, upon the ground of religious equality, admission to every office, and in making this recommendation, he added, "that under a free Government more than under any other form of Government, if you urge this plea and persevere in it, nothing can resist your power." If the Roman Catholic religion were dis severed from the political system, with which it was connected, the objections which he entertained would not possess one-half their force. But the experience of the whole of Europe at the present day showed that the Papacy was the centre and instrument of a powerful political propagandism, which in too many countries had proved itself revolutionary, and it was but the other day that extracts were published in this country from a most important document—he referred to the despatch of Prince Gortschakoff explaining the grounds of the abandonment of the Concordat between the Imperial Government and the Holy See—the Concordat of 1847; and connected with that despatch documents showing that, so far as was consistent with the safety of the State, the Russian Government had on several marked occasions made all possible concessions to the Roman Catholics, and had granted them complete security for their religious institutions and property. The result of these concessions had been witnessed in several insurrections, and at last a most bloody civil war in Poland, directly sanctioned by the Papacy. It was his intention to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department to lay that important document upon the table of the House, for he (Mr. Newdegate) had long noticed a parallel between the policy of the Papacy in Ireland and the policy of the Papacy in Poland, which could not be mistaken. The effect, however, of that policy in Ireland had been less violent, owing to the wiser government of Ireland by England. But still there was an analogy between the position of the people of Ireland and the position of the people of Poland, inasmuch as they were of the Roman Catholic religion to a great extent, and when it was proposed to sweep away the last vestige in Ireland of the fact that the Sovereignty of England was Protestant, it was high time that the House should look abroad; should not regard the subject in a narrow spirit; should not be deluded into the belief that we were merely making concessions to religious scruples when it was evident that these concessions would encourage a deep and wide-spread conspiracy.

CAPTAIN HERBERT supported the Motion. He thought it quite time that all such invidious distinctions founded on religious differences should cease. He drew attention to the fact that no Irishman or Papist was allowed to enter the Guards. How could they, when there was such a talk about friendship for the Irish people, maintain such exclusions? Why should not Irishmen be in the Guards? Or, rather, why should not Ireland have a regiment of Guards as well as Scotland? He thanked his hon. Friend for having introduced this subject.

MR. HADFIELD remarked that the comments of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), were based on the Church Establishment; but it was evident that there was at the present time a very uneasy feeling in the public mind relative to what was going on in the Church Establishment. Had the hon. Gentleman ever considered what had been stated, though not in his place in the House of Lords, by the Earl of Shaftesbury; had he reflected on the apathy shown by a Protestant Chancellor and thirty Bishops in the House of Lords with regard to this question? The fact was that they merely stood by and did nothing, leaving it to take its chance. He believed that there existed amongst all classes a cordial attachment to the Throne of this country, and was surprised at the course so often taken by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. That hon. Gentleman had for eight years fought a Bill which merely proposed to remove a declaration which the Leader of the Conservative party declared to be not worth the paper on which it was printed so far as regarded the protection of the Church of England. That declaration was at last repealed, and he trusted that many of the childish declarations and difficulties which in former times had arisen from events very different to those of the present day would be removed, and that the day would soon arrive when no man would be known but in respect of the excellence of his character and his desire to promote the interests of the country.

MR. WHALLEY said, he felt he could add nothing to what had fallen from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who, he was happy to see, had resumed the position he had occupied for so many years upon this subject. He must, however, express his amazement at the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Sheffield, whose presumption was beyond conception, because he would insist upon it that the various protections which existed were frivolous and unnecessary. The opinion which the hon. Gentleman had expressed appeared to be so chronic, so engraven in his mind, that he did not appear to remember what had been said by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Whatever might have been the course pursued by that hon. Gentleman for the last eight years the question now was not a question of religion, but whether it was or not a fact that, associated with the religious views professed by Roman Catholics, there were certain political opinions, which in all ages, and in all countries—and never more than at the present moment—were inconsistent with independence and with every principle of civil and religious freedom. The hon. Member for Sheffield appeared to have overlooked that fact, and to insist that all the precautions which our ancestors had framed and devised were frivolous and vexatious. He must also remind the House that if the question were decided according to the views of the hon. and learned Baronet they would be acting wholly without Parliamentary precedent. They had refused an inquiry, and adopted the sentiment of the hon. Member for Sheffield, that this was simply a question of religious scruple, which he firmly maintained it was not. He (Mr. Whalley) had been cried down in a former Session for asserting that the Fenian conspiracy had been originated in the interests of the Roman Catholic hierarchy; but if the House would grant a Committee to investigate the subject he was prepared to reiterate that assertion, and to prove it upon evidence as reasonable as the nature of the case admitted. From 1862 till very recently the treasonable organization had been sustained by the same power that gave it birth; and then, as in the case of all other Irish rebellions, when it had served its purpose, it was allowed to drop, the Roman Catholic hierarchy saying, "We will go no further in this business at the present time." Just as the Fenian pikes recently discovered were found carefully oiled and greased, and evidently laid by for a better opportunity, so the Fenian organization was put out of sight to be revived at some future period. The case of Ireland was almost identical with that of New Zealand. And, perhaps, the able and gallant General, now at the head of the War Department, would hereafter speak out and tell the House how it came to pass that 10,000 British soldiers were unable to put down 5,000 natives in insurrection, who were quelled by the colonists as soon as the soldiers were withdrawn. [Cries of "Question!"] If the House were enlightened upon the point, it would be found that the rebellion had been fomented by the Roman Catholic priests and persons professing the Roman Catholic religion.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to remove certain Religious Disabilities affecting some of Her Majesty's subjects, and to amend the Law relating to Oaths of Office.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Mr. COGAN, and Sir JOHN GRAY.

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS (HOUSE OF COMMONS.)

Standing Committee appointed and nominated, "to control the arrangements of the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the department of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House:"—Colonel FRENCH, Lord ROBERT MONTAGU, Mr. DALGLISH, Mr. ONSLOW, Mr. ADAM, General DUNNE, Mr. Alderman LAWRENCE, Mr. ROBERTSON, and Captain J. C. W. VIVIAN :—Three to be the quorum.

House adjourned at half after Seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 8, 1867.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Tyrone after the Death of his Father.

PRIVILEGE.—MR. R. S. FRANCE.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was sorry to have to call the attention of their Lordships to a matter personal to himself, which, however, he should not have brought before them had it not involved the privileges of their Lordships' House. He had received a pamphlet written by Mr. France, a railway contractor, which, purporting to give a review of his conduct as regarded a certain Railway Bill during its progress through the Legislature, not only canvassed his opinions, but also made some reflections upon him as Chairman of Committees. He had no objection to having his opinions canvassed by any one; but Mr. France went further, and boldly stated that he would deal with the noble Lord in his judicial capacity. Remarking that he was the contractor of the Mold and Denbigh Railway, he charged him (Lord Redesdale) with having come to an unwarrantable decision with reference to a Bill in which that railway was concerned, and with having inserted a clause in another Bill relating to the same railway. He (Lord Redesdale) was unable to understand how Mr. France could have confused matters as he had done; but it was much to be regretted that the circumstantial nature of his pamphlet gave it all the appearance of truth, while, as a matter of fact, it was false from beginning to end. He intended to draw Mr. France's attention to the matter by letter, and leave him to take what course he pleased; but unless he received from him a complete retraction of all the charges he had made against him, he should think it his duty, in the course of next week, to ask their Lordships to order Mr. France to the Bar of the House.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

HER MAJESTY'S Answer to the Address, reported as follows:—

"My Lords,

"I THANK you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

"You may be assured that I shall always be ready to co-operate with you in all Measures which have for their Object the Improvements of the Laws and Institutions of the Country, and the Promotion of the Welfare and Happiness of My People."

Address and Answer to be printed and published.

ROYAL NAVY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving for certain Returns respecting the Royal Navy, said: My Lords, I have thought it right to bring forward this Motion, because there has been, as it appears to me, a great misconception throughout the country as to the state in which the navy has been left by the late Government. I do not know whether I can ascribe that opinion to a few words which fell from the present First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) in another place at the end of last Session; but certainly the notion has spread until it has been stated in different parts of the country, and has been repeated for many months, that we have at the present moment no sufficient number of vessels for naval purposes, and that the country was left by the late Government without efficient protection so far as our navy is concerned, although there has been during the last six years a large expenditure devoted to that portion of the public service, amounting to between £65,000,000 and £70,000,000. Such at least has been the impression. Your Lordships will therefore see that it is desirable that no opportunity should be lost of calling for Returns showing what has really been done in the way of building ships during the six years that the late Government was in Office. As many ships, I believe, have at least been constructed during that period as during any other six years of peace. In those six years we built 140 vessels of different kinds. That is a considerable amount of shipbuilding. Not only have we done this, but it should be remembered that our path has been beset by difficulties. Great changes have taken place in construction both as regards iron and wooden ships, and much difference of opinion has existed as to the amount of plating which should be applied to the different classes of new ships. While the transition in all departments was so great, the Board of Admiralty over which I presided felt a great responsibility rested upon them in regard to the expenditure which should be incurred. On the one hand, we felt it desirable to do all we could to keep up the navy in a state of efficiency; and on the other, we recognised the folly of building a vast number of ships which might be useful at the moment, but which would certainly be superseded in the course of a few years. I think we acted wisely in not building ships faster, because iron-clads are a very expensive description of vessel, and new experiments and improvements were being constantly made with reference to size, armament, and sheathing. It was almost impossible to provide a very good fleet while these experiments were proceeding, or to collect a number of vessels and bring them to set together, as we might have done if greater uniformity prevailed among them. In fact, if any opinion was to have been given on our conduct, I thought that opinion would have been that we had done too much rather than too little in the way of shipbuilding. I had not only to determine what we should do, but to judge of the probable consequences hereafter. When I first came into Office we had not a single iron-clad vessel. We now possess thirty-three, many of them of great size. During a time of rapid progress in the art of shipbuilding it is almost impossible to construct a satisfactory fleet, because every new ship possesses improvements which render it superior to its predecessor. At the same time, it would have evinced great negligence of the true interests of the country to have adhered to the pattern of the first ship. The Warrior, for instance, was a very fine vessel at the time of its construction, but in the course of a few years it has become comparatively inferior to many others that have been since built. Neither the offensive nor the defensive qualities of that vessel are as good as we could wish. I was anxious, as far as possible, to anticipate the wants of the country a few years hence, and I think that we certainly have made considerable progress. I believe that, on the whole, there is no ground for dissatisfaction with the vessels that have been built. I have reason to believe that the opinions of the distinguished officers of the Channel fleet are favourable; and when, as at Cherbourg, the merits of our vessels have been compared with those of other nations, the general opinion was that we had no reason to be dissatisfied with the vessels we possessed. I cannot see, therefore, that there is anything to blame as far as the construction of our iron-clad ships is concerned. Then again, as regards the wooden vessels, in the early part of my administration—namely, from 1860 to 1862 or 1863—we did not know the gun which these vessels would have to carry. Unless you know what gun a vessel has to carry you are working a great deal in the dark, and it was clear that our ships would eventually carry a much larger gun than was then employed. The demands of the service, too, compelled us to repair and employ many of our old vessels, and this could only be done at a considerable cost. Upon these grounds, therefore, the number of vessels built was, I believe, as great as it should have been. I may, perhaps, now make a few observations on another point—the question of expenditure. It seems to have been supposed in many quarters that the whole of the £70,000,000 voted for the navy was applicable to the purposes of shipbuilding. Now, any such notion as that is a great misapprehension. The amount really expended in dockyards during those six years, not including vessels built by contract, would be about £10,000,000; but a great proportion of that sum has been expended in the repair and outfit of vessels already constructed. The proportion spent in building would be less certainly than half of the £10,000,000. We also built by contract vessels at an expense of about £7,000,000. This sum—namely, £7,000,000—with about £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 expended in the dockyards, would represent, I believe, the whole of our expenditure on shipbuilding. It has been charged against us that we were proceeding on a wrong principle. It must, however, be remembered that we were passing through a period of transition, when our progress had to be guided by experiment. Great praise had been lavished on vessels built in private yards, and their merits were extolled at the expense of those constructed in the Government yards. We were constantly warned that our ships as then constructed were of no use, and were told that the turret principle was the one which ought to be adopted. Reasons, of which the House is aware, induced the Admiralty to purchase a couple of turret vessels which were lying in the Mersey. Before we bought them, those by whom they were visited brought away flaming accounts of their excellent qualities—it was said that they were capable of destroying the whole fleet—but no sooner did they come into our possession than every one found fault with them. No doubt they are good vessels for coast defence; but the discomfort to the officers and men are so great that it soon became evident they were not fit vessels to send to sea. I paid them a visit, and, although the officers treated the matter with the good temper and good humour which usually characterize the officers of the navy, it was evident that there was a considerable amount of discomfort, and that if turret ships were adopted they ought not to be constructed according to that pattern. At another time we were told that we ought to imitate exactly vessels that were being built in America; and before the arrival of the Miantonomoh we were continually being asked why we did not build an impregnable vessel, whose sides should be but little above the level of the water, of great speed, carrying one or two heavy guns, and requiring but few men for her management. I was very glad when that vessel arrived at these shores, because it at once became apparent to every one conversant with the subject that it was impossible to make a crew comfortable on board such a ship. The ventilation depended entirely on the steam-engine, and the crew of the Miantonomoh were not only exposed to every discomfort, but they were liable to be smothered in the event of anything happening to the ventilating engine so as to prevent its working for a few minutes. I was informed by one of the officers on board that ship that on one occasion the engine had been stopped accidentally for a short time, and that the crew were scarcely able to breathe until it was set to work again. It was evident that it would have been impossible to send such a ship on a three years' cruise to any part of the world; and therefore vessels of this description, however well fitted for coast defence, would not be applicable to the general purposes of the British Navy. With regard to any general reduction in the expenditure upon the navy, I may remark that out of the £70,000,000 there were at least £40,000,000 expended upon objects with which no Board of Admiralty could interfere. With regard to the accounts, I can only say that I was very anxious that the most strictly accurate accounts should be kept in the dockyards. An enormous expenditure was incurred in those establishments in consequence of converting sailing vessels into steamers and wooden ships into iron-clads—the latter process involving the erection of very costly machinery for bending, planing, drilling, and otherwise working plates of iron six inches thick. I was very anxious, taking into consideration the vast and annually increasing expenditure in the dockyards, that a good system of keeping accounts should be introduced into those Departments; and accordingly in 1860 I consulted upon the matter with the late Sir Richard Bromley, who was well acquainted with the subject, and it was with his assistance that what are called “the Expense Accounts” were established, and an officer was appointed in each dockyard to audit the accounts. I believe, from what I have heard, that upon the whole the accounts are in a state of gradual improvement; and although I am not prepared to say that they may not be yet further improved, I am convinced that they are established upon a sound and good system. It was, however, objected in the House of Commons, and in the public newspapers, that our accounts were of no use, as it was not possible to ascertain from them the total cost of any particular vessel, so that the expenditure upon it might be contrasted with the price of a similar vessel built in a private yard. It was said that we ought to prepare a complete balance sheet like any private firm, showing the cost of each individual vessel, and that every expense in connection with each dockyard must be carried into account, and a balance struck in the same way as would be done in a private concern. I doubted whether such a system would not lead to confusion; but as the Board of Admiralty were anxious to meet the wishes of many Members of the House of Commons, we tried to do what was desired. It was necessary to take all the expenditure of each dockyard and to apportion it amongst the different vessels built or repaired there. At Portsmouth the expenditure on lectures and schools and a necessarily expensive police ran up the expense enormously, and when the accounts were placed before the House of Commons the remark was made—"Look at the enormous sums which your ships cost!" and it was alleged that ships built at Portsmouth cost a great deal more than they did in private yards. But was it fair to compare the expenses of public with those of private establishments of this kind? It was not possible to institute such a comparison without prejudicing the former. The object of our national dockyards is not merely to build ships quickly and cheaply, but to have great resources for their repair in time of war. To ensure that, you must have a large supply of machinery, a good deal of which will in time of peace be idle, and the idleness of which will prevent the manufacture being carried on economically. We were constantly told in 1863 that we ought to copy commercial men, who managed their affairs much better than we did; and one distinguished Member of the House of Commons, Sir Morton Peto, said, "Look at my firm; we have larger stores than the Admiralty. We have £17,000,000 dispersed all over the world, but we take stock constantly, and our accounts cause us no difficulty." I do not know whether the public would now repeat the advice which was then so frequently offered by the newspapers, more especially whether they would set up the example of Peto and Co. These were not the only subjects of accusation against us. Considering the smallness of the amount involved, a great deal has been said respecting the iron ballast which has been used to pave some portions of the dockyards. During the last twenty years a quantity of iron ballast has been from time to time taken out of sailing ships, and, as it was not required in steamers, the weight of whose engines obviated the necessity for ballast, it was piled up in various parts of the yards, where it occasioned a good deal of inconvenience. At Chatham a little of it was sold, but the purchaser afterwards found that it would not answer his purpose, and declined to take any more, and a similar attempt to dispose of it at Plymouth entirely failed. Long before I came into the Admiralty a quantity of this ballast had been used for paving the yards, and finding the piles of iron continually in the way, after vainly endeavouring to sell it, we continued to use it for paving as it was wanted. There is still, however, a large quantity piled up in some of the dockyards. Since it has been laid down it has proved of great service in facilitating the heavy traffic of the yards. It has, I hear, now turned out to be very valuable in a commercial point of view, and has been sold for an enormous sum. I am very glad to hear that such is the case, and all that has to be done is to take it up. I myself did not know how to sell it. Perhaps I did not know how to advertise it. Now, however, it had been admirably advertised; for when you want anything advertised you can find no better place in the world than the House of Commons in which to advertise it. I may remind the present Government that there are a number of old-fashioned cannon balls at Woolwich, which they might do well to advertise also, as, if old cast iron be so valuable, they would probably bring in a good round sum. These are samples of the accusations that have been made against the late Admiralty. I should have no fear of submitting their proceedings to the judgment of any Committee whatever, whether as regards the men or the building and repairing of ships. With regard to the subject of manning the navy, I may inform your Lordships that when the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) was last in Office, a Commission, of which Lord Hardwicke was Chairman, was appointed to take this question into consideration. When we succeeded to Office, the Board of Admiralty adopted the Report of that Commission, and dealt with many of its recommendations. We established training ships for boys, and improved in many ways the condition of the seamen, in accordance with the recommendations contained in that Report, and our measures were attended with great success. We had no difficulty in getting boys for the navy. It was said, why did we not take the pickpockets and idle boys off the streets of London and educate them for the navy—it was said they would make admirable sailors. Why, we did not want them. We had no difficulty in getting well-behaved lads who were educated for the purpose, and as for men, thanks to the continuance-service men and the lads for the training ships, our ships for the last four years when they have been commissioned have never had to wait for men. The training ships were established on a good system, the receiving ships were also very much improved, and the men on returning from leave went on board and remained there till they are wanted again. Of course, all this occasioned considerable expense, for the comforts of the men were increased. Then, as to the Reserve, we were told it was most important that such a body should be formed, and especially with a view to getting up a friendly feeling between the Mercantile Marine and the Royal Navy. We established the Reserve. This Reserve now contains 16,000 men, and the result certainly has been the creation of a very friendly feeling between the Mercantile Marine and the Royal Navy. Indeed, I believe that the good understanding between them was never better than at the present moment. In this respect we only carried into effect the recommendations of the Commission, and we carried out those recommendations as far as we could. We did not carry them all out, because that would have involved very considerable expense; and, considering that we were spending £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 annually upon the men for the navy and the Reserve, we did not think it advisable to go into further expense on that head. Then, as to docks and basins, we thought it quite necessary that increased docks and basins should be formed, and we added very considerably to our dock accommodation. When we came into Office there was no dock capable of receiving the Warrior. We enlarged one of the docks at Portsmouth, so as to fit it for the accommodation of that vessel. We improved and enlarged other docks both there, at Plymouth, and at other ports, and prepared a plan for the construction of new docks at Chatham and at Portsmouth, the carrying out of which would involve the expenditure of a very considerable sum of money. I had myself seen what had been done by France at

The Duke of Somerset

Toulon, by Italy, and by other Powers; and I was of opinion that we ought to lose no time in adding to our dock and basin accommodation—an opinion which was concurred in by a Committee of the House of Commons, which approved the plans submitted to it by the Board. Therefore, my Lords, I think that as regards men, and docks and basins, we did all that we ought to have done under the circumstances. It would have been unreasonable to go further, because the expenditure of those years was very large. We were obliged to increase our Estimates to meet the demands of the China war, and when we are carrying on a war at a distance of 15,000 miles it is desirable to place such a force in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief as shall enable him to bring that war to a close. That is the best economy, and we succeeded in it. I believe the great force we had in China was the means of bringing that war so speedily to a termination, and convinced the Chinese of the futility of any longer continuing the struggle against England and France. From 1860 till last year we have gone on somewhat reducing our Estimates. For my own part, I never desired to take a larger sum on the annual Estimates than necessary for the maintenance of such a force and for the construction of such vessels as were required for immediate service. While the navy is in a state of transition, I adhere to that opinion. At the same time, I am ready to admit that on this subject you must deal with matters as they are at the time, and as foreign politics may appear to require. That is a question for the Cabinet and not for the Admiralty. What the Board of Admiralty has to do is to maintain such a force as would be sufficient for the purposes required. In regard to the future, I do not expect there will be any great reduction in the Estimates unless there is a reduction of force. I can see no means of making a great reduction of expense without reducing the number of men, and as it is generally admitted that we must have a large fleet I do not imagine there will be any great reduction in the number of men. With respect to guns, I hope our three heavy guns of 6 tons, 9 tons, and 12 tons weight will prove useful and serviceable weapons wherewith to arm our vessels of war. These, my Lords, are the grounds on which I defend the policy which the late Board of Admiralty followed. I think we went as far in shipbuilding as we were entitled to do, and as to the position of the men and the general condition of the navy, we improved both; although, like all human institutions, the navy is, no doubt, capable of still further improvement. I have not said one word on the patronage of the Admiralty, because no appointments made by me have been ever attacked. There was one appointment, indeed, to which objection was made; that was the appointment of Mr. Reed as Chief Constructor of the Navy. That appointment, of which I am ready to undertake the full responsibility, I made under circumstances that rendered it absolutely necessary. It was necessary to build vessels plated round the water-line, and capable of carrying very heavy armaments; and we asked the department of the Controller to produce lines for certain vessels with proper flotation; but they could only produce them 400 feet long. I was convinced that there must be means of obtaining shorter vessels with the necessary flotation, and I therefore resolved to bring in a new person, and charge him with their construction. I afterwards received from some of the best authorities on the subject of iron construction a report in which they expressed their approval of the skill and ability with which an iron vessel had been put together in one of our dockyards. So far I am justified in the appointment of Mr. Reed, and I hope that the present Board of Admiralty may be equally fortunate in any appointment they may make. Without detaining your Lordships further, I shall now move that there be laid before this House—

“Return of the Number of Ships added to the Royal Navy by building or purchase, stating the Tonnage of each Vessel, from the Year 1860 to 1865 inclusive.”—(The Duke of Somerset.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords—Considering the many observations which have been made in certain quarters on the naval administration of the noble Duke, I cannot be at all surprised that he desires to take the earliest opportunity of bringing before your Lordships the state of the navy, and submitting to your Lordships an abstract, at least, of a certain blue-covered pamphlet—with which I believe the noble Duke to be tolerably familiar—written in vindication of the policy which the noble Duke pursued at the Admiralty. Certainly, my Lords, I have no cause to complain of the course which the noble Duke has taken in the vindication—in many respects unnecessary vindication—of his administration of the navy, still less so because, in vindicating his own economical arrangements with regard to the navy, he has laid the ground for future vindication of his successors against any attack of an excess of expenditure arising from circumstances and the progress of events such as the noble Duke has detailed to your Lordships. My Lords, I regret the less my inability to follow the noble Duke through the elaborate details into which he has entered, because I am very far from sharing in the condemnation which has been passed very freely on many portions of the noble Duke's administration. On the contrary, I always believed that the noble Duke was, in the administration of his office, an active, industrious, energetic Minister. I believe, moreover, that the noble Duke brought to the administration of his office a thorough and entire honesty of intention and purpose; and I should be the last man to deny that during the course of the noble Duke's seven years' administration there were many improvements introduced into the system of the navy—improvements of which the more merit belongs to him, because during the whole of that period, as regards ships and guns, the service was in course of transition, which rendered it more difficult for him to deal with the subject; and I should not have thought it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any observations if it had not been for a single remark the noble Duke made at the commencement of his observations, in which he referred to a speech made by a right hon. Friend of mine, the present First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington), very soon after he entered on office, with regard to the state of the Navy Reserve. I am sure the noble Duke will do my right hon. Friend the justice to say that during the whole of his administration he never met from him with any factious opposition, or anything but a cordial desire to support the measures which he introduced for the benefit of the navy, and approval of the expenditure which they rendered necessary. Very shortly after my right hon. Friend succeeded to the office of First Lord of the Admiralty a question was asked in the House of Commons as to the state of the Navy Reserve; and my right hon. Friend was obliged to say, in answer, that he regretted to state that he did not find the Navy Reserve in a satisfactory condition, or, indeed, in such a state as he had a right to find them—so much so, that the Admiralty had a difficulty in finding relief for the ships that return from foreign service. If my right hon. Friend wanted any justification for the statement it is to be found in the Report, with which the noble Duke must be more familiar than most of your Lordships. The Report is dated February, 1866; and upon this very point of the insufficiency of the Reserve the Report states—

“The same necessity for employing small vessels would, I apprehend, exist in a future war, and in peace time they are indispensable. And how do we stand? In the last two years there have been lost to the service—paddle-steamers, thirty; screw-steamers, twenty-two; and in the same period fifty-one gunboats have been removed from the navy. To replace these a very few small vessels, already on the stocks, are being completed, and seven of the Amazon class are building. In the meantime, our reserve is inadequate to supply the ordinary reliefs on foreign stations, and should an extra vessel be anywhere required we have not one disposable.”

The Amazon, as your Lordships will recollect, is the unfortunate vessel which has since been destroyed by accident. That is the Report, not of a hostile Committee, of the noble Duke's first Naval Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Frederick Grey, at the commencement of the Session of 1866. Consequently, my right hon. Friend the present First Lord of the Admiralty was obliged to say, in answer to a Question put to him in the House of Commons, and not bringing the matter forward in the way of accusation, that the state of the Reserve was not satisfactory, for, according to the language of a member of the preceding Board of Admiralty, the Reserve was not sufficient for the ordinary reliefs on foreign stations, and if one extra vessel were required, there was not one disposable. My right hon. Friend did not put this forward as a charge against the noble Duke; but the Report I have referred to is a complete vindication of the statement which my right hon. Friend could not but make in giving a plain and honest answer to the Question put to him. I need not say I have no objection to furnish the noble Duke with the Returns he asks for, but I would suggest to him that there should be some slight alteration in the form of the Return. The noble Duke, in the latter part of his speech, said he wished for a Return of the number of ships added to the navy, by building or purchase, in each year from 1860 to 1865, and I propose to insert the words

“in each year” in the Motion. I hope, too, that the noble Duke will carry the Return down to 1866; for, though the noble Duke is not responsible for the last half year of 1859, as the Estimates were then of his predecessors, he is responsible for the whole of 1866, for which the Estimates were brought forward by his Government. The Return in that form will give a complete detail of the whole number added in each year, and I think this alteration will be necessary in order to make it a complete Return of the state of the navy, as the noble Duke found it, and left it. It is not sufficient to make a Return of the additions made to the navy during that period; we ought to have a corresponding Return of the various vessels withdrawn, sold, lost, or otherwise disposed of within the same period. That will give exactly what the noble Duke requires. The reason why I lay stress on obtaining accounts of each separate year is because I find an extraordinary discrepancy in the amounts of the Estimates for the years in question. I confine my observations entirely to the building of vessels by contract, and I find that in the first five years of the noble Duke's administration of the navy, very large sums were taken; but it is a matter open to question whether in the last two years out of the seven of the noble Duke's administration, sufficient pains were taken by the Admiralty to keep up the stock of vessels of a description fitted for war. The variation in the Estimates is remarkable. For 1860-1 the amount for building by contract was £1,478,000; for 1861-2 it was £1,621,000; for 1862-3 it was £1,470,000; for 1863-4 it was £867,000; for 1864-5 it was £882,000; for 1865-6 it was £564,000; and for 1867 it was only £318,000. In these two last years the Estimates fall very far below the Estimates for building in the previous years. In 1865-6 the Estimate for an iron-clad vessel was £120,000, but no work was done in that respect, and the money was returned to the Exchequer; and out of the Estimate of £318,000 taken in the last year only £67,000 were expended for new ships. All this time foreign countries, and especially France, were rapidly increasing their navies, and we are told in the Report I have quoted that during the same period no less than fifty-two steamers and fifty-one gunboats were lost to the service. I think, therefore, it is important to see how far the Estimates of the two last years were sufficient to supply the deficiencies occasioned by the ordinary wear and tear of the service. The noble Duke says that the Estimates of the navy depend on the number of men, and that is true to a great extent. The noble Duke added that the Estimates do not depend on the First Lord of the Admiralty; and I can readily imagine that the noble Duke found that during the last years of his administration a very considerable difference of opinion prevailed between the Treasury and the Board of Admiralty with respect to the amount necessary to provide for keeping up the strength of the navy; but I should think there can be no doubt as to the desirableness of replacing the large number of ships that have been withdrawn. Having made these observations in vindication of my right hon. Friend against any supposition that he made a charge against the noble Duke, I can only say that I have listened with great satisfaction to the observations of the noble Duke, and have not the slightest objection to furnish the Returns in the form I have suggested—indeed, I think they will be of very great service.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I have no objection to the addition suggested by the noble Earl in regard to the vessels which have been done away with and disposed of in various ways; but I think it is desirable to state the class to which they belonged, because a mere list of numbers, without stating the character of the ships withdrawn, would be perfectly useless. I cannot suppose for a moment that the noble Earl will argue in favour of restoring the wooden line-of-battle ships withdrawn in 1859. We had no iron-clad fleet before that time, and therefore no comparison of numbers can afford a fair estimate of the strength of the navy at the two different periods. I presume, also, that notice will be taken, in reference to the expenditure referred to, of the vessels that have been built by contract. For my part, I have latterly wished, whenever an entirely new model is adopted, that the vessel should be constructed in a Government dockyard, for the simple reason that when a vessel is built by contract, we are absolutely bound by the specifications, and in the event of any alteration being required during the building, it is always attended not only with great expense, but with no end of delay. Within the last two years a heavy expense has been incurred in making the small changes and improvements in the class of vessels referred to by the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I agree with the noble Duke that a mere Return of numbers will not give the required information unless the different classes of ships are specified. I also think that the Returns should show as fully as possible not only the vessels which have been sold and otherwise lost in the service, but the alterations that have been made in the different classes of vessels. I hope the noble Duke will not think that I would object to the disposing of old and obsolete vessels. On the contrary, I am of opinion that as soon as it becomes manifest that a ship is no longer serviceable, it should be at once referred to an inspector, so as not to incur any additional or unnecessary expense in maintaining a vessel that is no longer useful.

EARL GREY said, the last observation made by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) induced him to express a hope that the construction of the navy was a matter in which the Government would not proceed too fast. Their Lordships must remember that in the Queen's Speech of 1859, Parliament was informed that a large Vote would be asked for the re-construction of the navy. That Vote was explained to be required in consequence of our wooden steam-ships of the line having fallen much below the required state of efficiency. In the debate that followed he (Earl Grey) ventured to protest against the proposed outlay at the time. He stated that it was already known that ships of the line built upon the system then in use would soon turn out to be useless for all the purposes of war. His remonstrance, however, was not listened to, and a considerable number of new ships were laid down at a great expense. Some of them, he believed, had never been completed at all, and some had been finished in a very different way from what was originally designed, and at an increased expense. The whole subject of naval construction was at present in such a state of transition—there was such a strong certainty that the ships of this year would not be the ships of the next five, or, perhaps, even of the next two years—that he held it to be most inexpedient to expend large sums of public money in building ships which they could not be assured would meet the exigencies of war when the time for their service really arrived. He very much doubted—and his doubts were shared by persons of far more knowledge than he could pretend to, whose attention had been carefully directed to the subject—whether our system of building iron-clads would, in the end, turn out to be a wise policy. Their Lordships were very well aware what was the custom in former days with regard to cavalry. Both men and horses were so overloaded with defensive armour that they were almost safe from the blows of an enemy—they were also almost as unable to injure him. By degrees this was seen to be a bad system; armour fell into disuse; and for knights so carefully protected that they had lost the power of offence, it was found advisable to substitute a swift and active cavalry. There seemed to be no small reason for believing that we might be falling into a similar mistake by over-weighting our vessels with armour and so crippling their movements. Some of our ablest men maintained that such was the progress of science that very soon no ship we might be able to build would be able to withstand the artillery brought into play, and that it would, therefore, be expedient to proceed upon a different system. He was much inclined to believe that instead of striving at an enormous cost to build iron-plated vessels able to resist the daily increasing power of artillery, it might prove to be better to build vessels of very great speed, carrying one or two of the most powerful guns, and trust to their not being hit to their power of destroying the enemy, rather than their being able to resist their projectiles. This principle, he thought, might very probably turn out to be the correct one as regarded the construction of the navy. At all events he was sure, seeing they were as yet ignorant of what might be the improvements and discoveries made in the future in regard to naval science, that it would be neither wise nor prudent to expend too large sums of money in producing armour-plated ships beyond what were immediately wanted according to our present lights. Years ago—so far back as the administration of Lord Melbourne—he was very much opposed to building ships of the line without steam power, being convinced that although the means then known of applying steam to the purposes of war were still so defective, it was certain that the progress of science would discover some means of using this most powerful agent in ships of war, and that therefore ships without it would become useless. But his objections were overruled. It was urged that we were too weak as compared to other Powers in line-of-battle ships, and that more must be built. Large sums were accordingly applied in building ships of that kind, which had proved, as he had ventured to predict, utterly useless. When this became evident, the cry was that we must lose no time in building a large fleet of screw ships of the line to take the place of those that had become obsolete. As he had already mentioned, this was formally recommended to Parliament in the Speech from the Throne in the year 1859, when he again opposed this policy, pointing out that it was already evident that the use of shells must soon make the use of these large wooden ships impossible without extreme danger. In spite of his opposition, however, large sums of money—hundreds of thousands, if not millions—had been spent in building vessels which he had condemned, and which were now admitted to be useless. He must say that the responsibility of these errors rested not with the Admiralty, not even with the Government that might be in power, but with the House of Commons. Whenever there was a great mistake made in the administration, it generally arose from the pressure put upon the Government in the House of Commons, to adopt without due consideration some measure for which there might be a popular cry at the moment, and the consequence had been that there had been a great waste of the public money upon the navy. He ventured to say that if their Lordships went into a careful examination of the money that had been so wasted it would be found that a great part of it was attributable to the House of Commons.

Motion amended and agreed to.

Ordered, That there be laid before this House Return of the Number of Ships added to the Royal Navy by building or purchase, stating the Tonnage of each Vessel, in each Year from the Year 1860 to 1866 inclusive :

A similar Return of all Ships, stating their Description and Tonnage, withdrawn from the Royal Navy by Sale, Loss at Sea, or otherwise, during the same respective Years.—(The Duke of Somerset.)

PROPOSED TRADES UNIONS DEMONSTRATION ON MONDAY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY, in rising to ask the intention of the Government with respect to the proposed procession of members of trades unions through several of the most crowded thoroughfares of the metropolis and the West End next Monday, said, he was fully aware of the delicacy of the subject to which he was about to address himself; but there was a general feeling that such processions assembling and taking possession of the principal streets of London, for the purpose of making what was termed a demonstration, was an evil that was on the increase, and if allowed to go on would assume a position to defy all attempts to interfere with them, and therefore it was that he had deemed it his duty to bring the matter under the notice of the House; and he must confess that, after the announcement which had been made by Her Majesty's Ministers on the first day of the Session, he had hoped that those who took the most active part in promoting the intended demonstration would have come to the conclusion that there was no necessity for making it, for a most distinct promise had then been given on the part of the Government that they would lose no time in dealing with the great question of Reform, which was undoubtedly the great question of the day. He was, under these circumstances, greatly grieved to find that the leaders of the movement should, instead of waiting to learn what course Ministers might take on the question, deem it necessary to be beforehand with them. He deeply regretted that there should be any necessity for a Member of their Lordships' House rising for the purpose. In what he was about to say with regard to the proposed trades procession, he hoped it would be distinctly understood that he had no desire whatever to say a single word which might tend to irritate the public mind; and if he did use any expression of such a nature, he assured their Lordships that it would only be used in mistake and not from intention. Indeed, at the present moment the public mind was quite enough excited upon the subject without anything uttered in Parliament being construed into a ground of further irritation. He could look upon the proposed meeting and procession of Monday next in no other light than a monstrous demonstration of the trades unions of the country. He would be the last man to stand up in their Lordships' House and deny the right of the people to meet and discuss any political grievances under which they deemed themselves to be suffering, or for the purpose of procuring a fair representation of their opinions in Parliament. But that was a very different thing from the procession with which we were threatened on Monday next, which, under pretence of meeting in the Agricultural Hall, at Islington, was to assemble in Trafalgar Square. He felt that the fair and open discussion of political subjects was not the real object of the proposed meeting; for no one could fail to see that at such a meeting no discussion in the ordinary sense of the term could take place, but that it was held, if not for the express purpose of intimidation, at least by bringing immense multitudes of people to a central place in the metropolis, and then taking a circuitous route through all the most frequented streets of London, to cause such a demonstration as might influence Parliament in its deliberations on the question of Reform. Surely, if those persons who proposed to come from the north, south, east, or west of the metropolis, and congregate in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square, really wished to go to the Agricultural Hall at Islington, for the purpose of discussing their political grievances, there was no occasion to resort in the first place to a great central square, from which the start was to take place. He understood that measures for the preservation of the public peace had been taken, to the extent at least of procuring six out of every hundred persons being sworn as special constables. [The Earl of DEBY intimated dissent.] The noble Earl shook his head; but if he were incorrect in that statement, all that he could say was that he was sorry that there should be less endeavour on the part of the promoters of the meeting to preserve the peace than he gave them credit for. Nobody could deny that the passing of such a procession through the principal streets in a circuitous instead of in a direct line was designed mainly for the purpose of producing an effect on the clubs and the West End of the town; and he reminded their Lordships that every time such a procession were permitted, it became a precedent which rendered every similar attempt less likely to be resisted. He thought it rather unwise that the Department of the Government which had been more in direct communication with the leaders of this proposed demonstration than had usually been the case in any similar circumstances, had not exercised their powers of persuasion more successfully for its prevention, and thus rendered it unnecessary to call the attention of Parliament to the subject. He knew very well how difficult it was in discussing such a question with a large body of men to say that such a course could not be permitted; but he had hoped, at all events, that the counsel which the Government seem to have taken with the leaders of this movement, would have enabled them to have pointed out the loss and inconvenience which must result to the populace who happened to reside in the thoroughfares which were chosen as the route of the procession. But though these meetings might be permitted now, the matter was, after all, a question of degree; for it was possible that they might become such an enormous grievance that it would be absolutely necessary to put a stop to them. He should be the last person in the world to rise for the purpose of embarrassing the Government. On the contrary, after the course they had announced with reference to Reform, and which, he thought, was the only course they could have pursued, everybody must have wished that the proposed demonstration might have been dropped; but arrived as they were now within a few hours of the meeting, the Government must have determined upon the steps they would take; and there could be no want of discretion, therefore, in asking them to state, for the information of Parliament, what those steps were.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I can assure the noble Earl that no apology was required from him for asking the question which he has just put to me. There can be no doubt that this question is one of very serious importance; and I can assure him, also, that he cannot regret more deeply than I do that those who have the conduct of the vast organization, and on which they have expended so much pains and care for several months past, should not have taken a more correct and a sounder view of the duty they owe to the public and the interests of the country generally than to persist in holding a procession which, although I am bound to say it is strictly within the law, yet is certainly liable to produce, and must produce, very great inconvenience, and perhaps, also, acts of illegality. But the noble Earl (the Earl of Dudley) does Her Majesty's Government too much honour in supposing that their powers of persuasion are such as to induce these gentlemen to forego the advantage of being allowed to display in the streets their immense organization, with marshals and sub-m Marshals, with stars, scarves, banners, and an exhibition of the most perfect military discipline. We certainly cannot pretend to such influence with the leaders of this movement as to have persuaded them, in deference to any opinions of ours, or to any measures which we are likely to introduce on the subject of Reform, to desist from the course on which they have long determined. Moreover, my Lords, much as I deprecate the course these gentlemen are pursuing, I entirely believe that they desire, as far as they can, that the procession may be perfectly peaceable and orderly. But the noble Earl will allow me to say that he is in error when he supposes that a certain number of each of these bodies are to be sworn in as special constables. It is not within the law that they can be sworn in as special constables; for no man can be so sworn in except upon information sworn before a magistrate to the effect that the person who swears such information believes that a breach of the peace is imminent, and that, in order to guard against such breach of the peace, he tenders his services to preserve the peace. Now, it is quite clear that these gentlemen, coming forward and saying—I believe most sincerely—that they are acting with the most peaceable intentions, could not be expected to swear that the assemblage of delegates and of various other bodies which they are organizing will be such an assemblage as endangers the public peace. Not but that I think breaches of the peace will be committed, though certainly not by those who are engaged in the procession; but when, in the heart of a crowded metropolis, processions of, it may be, 40,000, 50,000, 60,000, or 70,000 men gather and occupy busy thoroughfares for a considerable portion of the day, it is impossible that the idle and vagabond class on such occasions should not cause much inconvenience and some danger. And I would have the gentlemen who undertake the conduct of these vast processions to recollect that although the procession itself may not be illegal, yet it may become illegal through the circumstances attending it; and in that case those who so recklessly expose the metropolis to danger cannot escape from the responsibility they thus incur. They must, and they will, be held personally liable for any loss to property or to person which may result from their acts. There can be no doubt that the proposed meeting will cause very considerable obstruction of the ordinary traffic, and great inconvenience—that it must cause great loss both to the operatives themselves, who will lose a day's wages, and also to the shopkeepers, and inconvenience to everybody to an incalculable extent;—and all for what? For the purpose, as they state, of making a demonstration in favour of Reform. But Her Majesty's Government, as the noble Earl says, are quite prepared to deal with that question, and bring it forward for the consideration of Parliament. And here I must remark that demonstrations of this kind are little calculated to promote that calmness with which so grave a question ought to be submitted to Parliament. Moreover, if we are to believe the assertions of the leaders of this organization, the multitudes who are about to assemble in this way are to meet for an object to which I will not say the present Government, but to which no Government, and no statesman who can ever be called upon to conduct the affairs of this country, would ever consent; because we are told that that which alone will satisfy these vast assemblages and their leaders is the adoption of manhood suffrage and vote by ballot—two things which, combined, would absolutely and entirely overthrow the Constitution of this country. Well, what encouragement has Parliament for entering upon the course of deliberating and considering how far it should extend the franchise and increase the liberties of the people if it is told, "All you do is nothing—is of no use whatever. Here we bring together a demonstration of our physical strength and our numbers, to show you, the Parliament, that unless you do that which we know it is impossible you can ever consent to do, all your labours will go for nothing—they will produce no gratitude, but will only lead to fresh demonstrations and exhibitions of force, until we obtain that which would be a practical revolution in this country?" My Lords, I have not so poor an opinion of the House of Commons as to believe for a single moment that any demonstration of this sort will intimidate them or lead them to consent to extreme demands. On the contrary, I only hope it may not have the opposite effect of deterring them from fairly and candidly considering the merits of the case, and that they may not be induced to refrain from giving that which may safely, reasonably, and justly be given, owing to exhibitions of physical force and of numbers on behalf of that which is wholly alien to the Constitution and the spirit of the country. In regard to the noble Earl's inquiry as to what the Government are going to do in respect to the proposed procession, it is only necessary to say that they will confine themselves within the limits of the law. We have carefully considered what measures it might be in our power to take to put a stop to this demonstration and interfere with its progress; and we are informed that this procession, however mischievous, injurious, and liable to produce loss of property, and it may be of life, is not in itself illegal, and that we should not be justified in interfering with it so long as it conducts itself peaceably, and only passes quietly through the streets. There are two Acts of Parliament which bear on this subject. One of them, passed in the reign of Charles II., prohibits any persons, under a penalty, from attempting to present petitions to Parliament in greater numbers than ten together. There is another Act of George III., to which, I suppose, the noble Earl referred, in respect to assemblages within a mile of Parliament. It provides that if any persons shall assemble within a mile of Parliament for the purpose of either passing resolutions, petitions, or remonstrances with regard to matters concerning the State, in that case the assembly shall be an illegal assembly, with all the penal consequences attaching to it as such. But there is nothing in the statute to say that persons shall not meet within a mile of Parliament for the purpose of there forming a procession—not to come down to Parliament with a view of intimidating it, but, as is said to be intended in this instance, with a view of proceeding exactly in an opposite direction—to Islington, there to hold a meeting in the great Agricultural Hall. There is nothing absolutely illegal in that. The duty of the Government, therefore, must in this case be confined to taking care to have an ample amount of force ready to interfere, if necessary, for the preservation of the public peace, or for its restoration, if that peace is disturbed. Further than that it is not within our legal competence to interpose. But the noble Earl said—and it is a point very well worth consideration—that the constant repetition of these processions and demonstrations may render it necessary to make some alteration in the law. I trust that nothing of the kind will be required, because we know that such an alteration of the law, however just or necessary, would meet with very great resistance, and might be thought an undue interference with the liberties of the people—an interference which could not be justified, except by a general feeling on the part of the country, that these demonstrations had become quite intolerable, and a source of evil and mischief so grave as to render the interposition of Parliament imperatively requisite. Therefore, I can only say that, while deprecating the holding of this procession, yet finding it legal, we can do nothing except provide a force sufficient for the preservation of the peace. We much regret the course about to be pursued by its promoters, and we think it one which is liable to lead to the most unfavourable consequences, and likely to create a feeling of bitterness between the different classes of the community, which it is the duty of every good citizen as far as possible to prevent.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I speak in the presence of noble and learned Lords who will correct me if I am wrong, but the impression on my mind, from my recollection of former statements in Parliament and elsewhere, when matters of a similar nature have been under discussion, and from the decisions of the Judges, is this—that when any great assembly of persons is held under circumstances which create fear—reasonable fear—in the minds of firm men, such assembly becomes of itself illegal, whether any act of violence be committed or not.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My noble Friend has not exactly stated the proposition correctly. It is true it has been frequently decided by the Judges of the land that large assemblages of persons, in terrorem populi, would constitute an unlawful assembly; but no mere assemblage of numbers would make a meeting illegal. There must be a fear of violence or disturbance of the public peace in order to constitute an unlawful assembly.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: But this is not a mere assemblage of persons, but an assemblage of persons sufficiently drilled to carry a column of 40,000 or 50,000 men in military array through the streets of London. That is not an ordinary meeting of men, it is not one of the meetings within the contemplation of the law.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: As I understand it, they are sufficiently drilled to be able to proceed peaceably in procession through the streets.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, That the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table: The same was Ordered to be printed.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, February 8, 1867.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Colchester, v. Taverner John Miller, esquire, Manor of Northstead.

SELECT COMMITTEE—On Mines appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—*Resolutions in Committee—*Dublin University Professorships.

Ordered—Metropolitan Poor; Trades Unions; Criminal Law; Dublin University Professorships*; Mines*; Libel*.

First Reading—Criminal Law [8]; Metropolitan Poor [9]; Dublin University Professorships* [10]; Libel* [11].

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Viscount Royston) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:—

"I have received with much satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

"You may rely with confidence on My cordial co-operation in all measures which are calculated to enlarge and strengthen the free institutions of the Country, to improve the Administration of the Law, and to promote the welfare and prosperity of all classes of My subjects."

INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House Copy of the Minutes of the Chief Commissioner of Oudh and of the Governor General, on the Report of Mr. Davies, the Financial Commissioner, on the rights of the Ryots, and of any Orders passed by the Home Government of India on Sir John Lawrence's decision; whether the Home Government, as stated in the Indian Journals, has called for a Report on the late famine in Bengal; and, whether attention has been directed to the following points:—1st. The extent of country affected, and the mortality caused; 2nd. The causes of the famine, and how far avoidable in future by works of irrigation; 3rd. The amount of warning of its approach, and how far the existing machinery of revenue administration is adapted to give the needed warning; 4th. The measures of precaution adopted by the Local Government of Bengal on receipt of such warning?

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: With respect to the first Question of the hon. Gentleman, no orders have as yet been authorized or passed by the Queen's Government on the subject of Sir John Lawrence's decision. The Home Government have the subject under consideration; and I hope that a despatch will be shortly sent out. As soon as it is it will be laid on the table of the House, with the Minutes of the Chief Commissioner of Oude and of the Governor General, on the subject to which the hon. Gentleman's inquiry refers. With respect to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman, the Queen's Government has ordered a Commission to be issued to inquire into the causes of the famine in Bengal, and the mortality which that famine produced, and that Commission has been issued by the Governor General. By the news of the last mail we have every ground to hope that the Commission will send in a speedy Report. The instructions given to the Commission were very large, but they substantially included all the points referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. BRIGHT asked the noble Lord to state whether the Commission was composed entirely of members of the Indian Government, or whether there was any portion of it independent, so that it would be likely to give a little more confidence to the country.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I do not exactly know what meaning the hon. Gentleman attaches to the words "Indian Government." The President of the Commission is a Judge. A gentleman connected with the revenue administration and a colonel are the other members of the Commission; and I believe the names of all three will secure for the Commission the confidence of the Indian community and of the public generally. I may mention that the President is Judge Campbell, one of the best names in India.

CATTLE PLAGUE IN THE METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

MR. DENT asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If he can give the House any information as to the cause and extent of the recent outbreak of Cattle Plague in the Metropolis?

MR. CORRY: As to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, relating to the cause of the recent outbreak of cattle disease in the metropolis, I beg to inform him that the Privy Council caused an immediate and searching inquiry into the subject, but as yet it has received no satisfactory information. In respect to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's Question—the extent of the disease—it appears that forty-six animals had been exposed to the infection, the whole of which were slaughtered under pressure of the Privy Council, or the local authority, but not until twenty-eight had caught the disease. The first case occurred on the 28th of last month. No fresh case has been reported since.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for India, When the distribution of the Central India Prize Money (Lord Strathnairn's captures) will take place; and, what is the reason of the delay in distributing the same?

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: The principal cause of the long delay in distributing the proceeds of Lord Strathnairn's captures has been the very protracted litigation which has taken place with respect to them; but after the conclusion of that litigation a Treasury Warrant, under Sign Manual, was issued, and sent by us, last year, to India, with a very strong admonition as to the necessity of rapidly distributing the money. I have not heard whether the final steps have been taken; but I believe the distribution will be made very shortly.

THE PROFESSORSHIP OF THE UNIVERSITY OF DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

MR. VANCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the vacancy in the Professorship of the University of Dublin has been filled up?

Mr. WALPOLE said, that he did not believe that the vacancy in the Professorship of the University of Dublin had been filled up.

OUR MONETARY LAWS.

QUESTION.

Mr. WATKIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When—referring to the pledge of the President of the Board of Trade last Session that the Government would in the recess look into the causes of the Commercial Panic and into the operation of our Monetary Laws, “with the earnest desire, if possible, to legislate on the subject,” “or to invite the attention of the House to the subject,” at the earliest period—he proposes to put the House in possession of any evidence taken, and of the views and intentions of the Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is not our intention to place any evidence on the matter before the House, nor to legislate on the subject of the cause of the monetary panic. I think it will be a convenient opportunity, when the hon. Gentleman moves for a Committee on the subject of the Limited Liability Acts, to state the general views of the Government as to the course it may deem it necessary to take in the matter.

THE HOLY SEE AND RUSSIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. NEWDEGATE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House the Circular Despatch of Prince Gortschakoff to the Russian Representatives abroad relative to the breaking off of the relations between the Holy See and the Imperial Government, and to the abrogation of the Concordat of 1847, together with the Documents annexed, Extracts from which have appeared in the Newspapers of this country?

LORD STANLEY: The paper to which my hon. Friend refers has been published by the Russian Government; it has been printed at length in many of the Continental journals, and I believe the substance of it has appeared in several of the English newspapers. It is therefore quite accessible to all the world; and as it relates to a matter with which the English Government has nothing to do—namely, the relations between Russia and the Holy See—I would ask the hon.

Gentleman to consider whether it would not be a waste of money to print the document, unless there should be a general desire on the part of the House that it should be put in the hands of hon. Members. If there is such a desire on the part of the House, of course, we have no objection; or if my hon. Friend or any other hon. Gentleman wishes to reprint and circulate it he may have access to a copy at the Foreign Office.

Moved, “That the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday.”

LAW OF FORFEITURE.—QUESTION.

Mr. CHARLES FORSTER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce a measure for the abolition of the Law of Forfeiture on convictions of Felony, founded on the provisions of the Bill which obtained the assent of this House in the last Session? He remarked, that when the Conservative party was in Office in 1859, two distinguished Members of the Government, the present Lord Chief Baron Kelly and the present Lord Chief Justice Whiteside, gave their assent to a Bill for the abolition of the Law of Forfeiture, and had it not been for the circumstance of a change of Administration, that Bill would probably have been passed. The House would also remember that he had brought this subject under its notice in 1864, when he introduced a Bill, the principle of which was affirmed by the House on the second reading. He then had great pleasure in acceding to the request which was made to him, to leave the further conduct of the measure in the hands of the hon. and learned Member for Richmond and the Attorney General. His measure was received with great favour on both sides of the House, and was generally regarded as a very important measure of legal Reform. That Bill went up to the House of Lords, but he regretted to say that circumstances occurred which prevented its passing. The present system was fraught with great injustice, and acted most injuriously on the mining interests of the country at large. A deputation from the traders of South Staffordshire had waited upon the late Government on the subject, and stated that they were unwilling to engage in trade from the fear of exposing themselves to the penalties of conviction for manslaughter in consequence of accidents from causes over which they had no control.

Mr. Vance

So strongly did he feel on this subject, that he was determined, in case he should not receive a favourable reply from the right hon. Gentleman, to re-introduce the Bill he had brought forward in 1864. He hoped, however, that the reply of the right hon. Gentleman would relieve him from the necessity of doing so, for a matter so important could be more satisfactorily dealt with by Government than by a private Member.

MR. WALPOLE: I have referred to the Bills of 1865 and 1866, and have found that, although they both have the same object, they contain very different provisions. The subject is certainly an important one, but the importance of the object sought to be attained depended mainly upon the provisions to be comprehended in the Bill. Nobody can doubt that not a more careful person than my hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General could have been engaged in preparing such a measure as this, and therefore I shall not be inclined to doubt any provisions which he may have inserted in the Bill. At the same time, there are provisions in the Bill of last year which I should like to consider with the present Attorney General before introducing another measure this year. The probability is, that after a consultation with my learned Friend, I shall be prepared to introduce a Bill on the subject, having the same object in view as the former Bills, though, perhaps, with not exactly the same provisions.

MR. HADFIELD urged the propriety of speedy legislation, as the principle of the Bills presented on the subject had received the general assent of both Houses.

Motion agreed to: House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE. QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be good enough to give some information to the House on a matter of considerable importance, What will be the course of business on Monday, and what Orders he proposes to place on the paper in order that he may be able to open the important subject of which he has given notice?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I intend to put on the paper the subject which I mentioned I should bring forward the first on Monday next—namely, to consider the paragraph in the Queen's Speech with regard to the Representation of the People. I hope the House will not press me to go into detail now as to the Motion I propose to make, as such a course might lead, perhaps, to misconception and misapprehension of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I trust that the House will excuse me doing so at the present time. I shall therefore confine myself to saying that the first Order of the Day for Monday will be one in effect to call the attention of the House to the subject to which I have referred, which is mentioned in the Queen's Speech. I shall then enter fully and fairly into the exposition of the subject and the proposals of Her Majesty's Government.

SUPPLY.

Committee on Motion, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty."

Resolved, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty."

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill for the establishment in the Metropolis of Asylums for the Sick, Insane, and other classes of the Poor, and of Dispensaries; and for the distribution over the Metropolis of portions of the charge for Poor Relief; and for other purposes relating to Poor Relief in the Metropolis, said: In bringing before the House the subject of which I have given notice, I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible in my explanation of the provisions of the Bill which I shall have to submit to the House. At the same time, I trust that the House, admitting the great importance of the subject, will allow me to make those remarks which are necessary, in order that they may have fully before them the scheme which I am about to propose for the management of the poor in the metropolis. It is not my intention, on this occasion, to go much into the past. I think we had much better avoid discussions which can lead to no good result with respect to what has been done on former occasions. But it will be necessary to some extent to refer to the past history of what has taken place in respect to the management of the metropolitan poor, in order to explain the reasons why I have felt it to be my duty to submit this question to the consideration of the House. I will not go very far back in my retrospect. A Committee sat upon the question of Poor Relief, not only as it affected the metropolis, but England generally. It began its inquiries in 1861, and reported in 1864. Now, it is a remarkable thing—very remarkable, it appears to me when I look upon what has occurred since—that nothing was brought before that Committee tending to implicate the management of the workhouses in the metropolis in the charges which subsequently created so much excitement not only in London, but in the country also. Nothing was brought before that Committee tending to show that the metropolitan workhouses in their management presented features of a disadvantageous character as compared with those in the country generally. On the contrary, there was every reason to suppose that those workhouses were properly managed, and that the treatment of the poor inmates did not demand intervention. Of course, then, the Report of that Committee did not touch upon the circumstances that have since been disclosed, inasmuch as there was nothing pressed upon the Committee at all relating to them; indeed, they rather expressed their satisfaction with the medical treatment of the poor generally, and said, I think, that it required no alteration, and that nothing further was necessary to be done in order to bring the medical treatment of the poor generally into a more satisfactory state. They said, however, that not only in the metropolis, but throughout the country, the central authority of the Poor Law Board ought to be confirmed, and, if possible, strengthened, and that it might be done, in one way, by lengthening the term for which the Commission was appointed. They went on further to say that it was specially required that for classification in workhouses—and that without reference to the metropolis only—more powers should be given to the Central Board—

“It appears to the Committee that the union workhouse is insufficient for the proper classification of the inmates, and they consider it desirable that greater power should be given to the Central Board than what they now possess, to require the guardians to make adequate arrangement for maintaining such classification in the workhouses.”

In 1864, then, we had arrived at this point. After a long and elaborate inquiry, conducted by highly-qualified judges of the Poor Law, the conclusion was arrived at that the Central Board was without sufficient authority for the classification of the poor, and generally for the proper administration of the poor relief throughout the country. Towards the end of 1864, the case of Timothy Daly occurred in the Holborn Workhouse; it was the first of those cases which so much attracted the attention of the country; it was followed by that of Gibson in the workhouse of St. Giles, in 1865. In April of the same year, a letter written by one of the nurses at the Rotherhithe Workhouse called attention to a very painful state of circumstances there; and finally, in 1866, the same nurse called attention to the state of the Strand Workhouse, where she had been lately engaged as a nurse. Inquiries took place with reference to Daly and Gibson's cases, and in 1865 the Rotherhithe guardians inquired into the statements made by that nurse. No action was then taken by the Poor Law Board on the evidence taken by those guardians; but in 1866, upon the requisition of the Workhouse Infirmary Association, official inquiries were made respecting the condition of the sick in the Strand, Rotherhithe, and Paddington Workhouses by inspectors, whose reports were exceedingly adverse to the management of the sick in these workhouses and caused a great sensation throughout the country—perhaps a greater sensation than was justified by all the circumstances. When one considers that in the metropolis there are thirty-nine workhouses, containing a population of from 25,000 to 30,000 persons, it would not strike one as remarkable that there should have been four cases in which great hardship and wrong had been inflicted. No doubt many things were revealed which showed that there was necessity for interference, but these particular cases, each seen in varied shapes, as it were, in a kaleidoscope, through the comments of the press, caused a sensation, which if not unreasonable or unnatural, was perhaps disproportioned to the circumstances under which they occurred, and blame was imputed to the guardians, not only of the workhouses in question, but of the workhouses of the metropolis generally. Every one must admit that the office of a guardian is one of great difficulty and delicacy. He has to stand between the poor and the ratepayers; he is continually pressed on one side and the other; and in London he is watched with excessive scrutiny by the press, particularly after the occurrence of cases like those named; through these discussions he becomes more fearful of acting on his own responsibility, and there is a vacillation in his movements which there would not have been if he was left more alone. At the same time, I will not say it is not advantageous that there should be the fullest scrutiny into every transaction of the kind referred to, and that the fullest publicity should be given to all the circumstances connected with institutions which so materially affect the welfare of the poor and the interests of the ratepayers, both of the metropolis and the country generally. During 1865 and 1866, whilst these things were going on, a well-conducted newspaper, The Lancet, thought proper to employ, at its own expense, certain medical men, who made full inquiry into the administration of the sick departments of the metropolitan workhouses. I should be the last person to complain of the mode and manner in which that inquiry was conducted, it being conducted in a tone and spirit very different from that which characterized the comments of some other portions of the press. On the whole, The Lancet founded its animadversions on facts and incidents that really occurred, and it did not indulge in mere sensational writing as some other papers did. The articles in The Lancet naturally made a great impression, because they called attention to the facts that the construction of the sick wards in the workhouses was bad in itself; that in the main they were overcrowded; that the nursing was bad and wholly inadequate; the ventilation in almost every respect was defective; and that the furniture, appliances, clothing, and cooking arrangements were bad, and not at all appropriate to the wants of the sick. In May, 1865, in consequence of the prominence which the subject of nursing had acquired, a circular was sent out by my right hon. Predecessor, calling the attention of the metropolitan guardians to the inadequacy of the staffs, and calling upon them to appoint at least one paid nurse to superintend each sick ward, and also to appoint paid assistant nurses who might wait with more responsibility on the patients. Subsequently, a full investigation into the state of the sick wards was undertaken by the Poor Law Board itself, through its medical officer and inspector, Dr. Edward Smith, and Mr. Farnall, inspector of the metropolitan district; and their inquiry did not terminate until just before the change of Government which took place last year. Their Reports were, however, in the hands of my Predecessor, but no action had been taken upon them up to the time that I succeeded to the office I now hold. Hon. Members who take an interest in this subject will find that Mr. Farnall's Report is based upon one supposition, and Dr. Edward Smith's upon another. Mr. Farnall's Report is based upon what he called the requirements of medical science—namely, that certain medical men of the greatest eminence urged that 1,000 feet cubical space was required for each inmate of a sick ward; whilst, on the other hand, Dr. Edward Smith's Report was based on the understanding that the requirements of the Poor Law Board was what he had to see to. It appeared that up to this time 500 feet cubic space was considered sufficient for a sick ward, and he thought it was his duty to inquire how it had worked. Both, however, came to the conclusion that the workhouse infirmaries are overcrowded, that the nursing is defective, that the appliances are also defective, that the ventilation is insufficient, and that great reform is needed in the sick wards of the workhouse infirmaries. That was the state of things when I had the honour to be appointed to the office which I now hold. At that time my attention was called in this House to those cases to which I have referred, and others, in which it was said that great negligence, cruelty, and hardship had occurred to individuals in these workhouses, and I then said it would be my first duty to endeavour to mitigate, with the powers I possessed, the evils which then existed. I stated, at the same time, that I felt that the time must come when I must ask the House for powers to provide permanent remedies for evils which without I could only temporarily moderate. It has been asked in many quarters why I did not put in force the compulsory powers that belong to the Poor Law Board. In my opinion there has not yet arisen occasion to put them in force, because nearly everything I have asked has been done, or is in the course of being done, and it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to have proceeded by mandamus in the case of medical officers, legal and technical questions and questions of contract would undoubtedly have been raised. No doubt the Poor Law Board possesses the power to enforce the appointment of officers, but the power must be exercised carefully, and strictly within the limits of the law; and I thought that, as the time was approaching when I could ask the House for further powers, it would be unwise and imprudent to involve myself in a collision in which I might get the worst of it, and which might give rise to a feeling that I had used powers I did not possess, or that I had used legal powers unnecessarily. Besides, on the whole, the guardians were acting in a fair spirit; they were adopting the suggestions that were made to them, and were endeavouring to carry them out. At the same time, I am bound to say that the two inspectors who then had charge of the metropolitan district, Mr. Corbett and Dr. Markham, discharged their duties in the most indefatigable manner, and were deserving of every praise. They visited the workhouses by night and by day, and consulted the guardians, endeavouring by firmness and conciliation to obtain the remedies that would mitigate the evils which had been justly complained of, and simultaneously procuring information to enable me to propose legislation on this very important subject. I may be permitted to call attention to the letter of Mr. Ernest Hart which appeared in one of the daily papers, because he is a gentleman who has devoted his attention to the reform of our workhouses, and particularly the workhouse infirmaries. I am not going to put forward anything that I may have done other than to say that I have endeavoured to do my best; but I will take it on Mr. Hart's admission that much has been effected already in the way of temporary remedies—ventilation has been improved, paid nurses have been provided, more medical officers have been provided, and the furniture and other appliances required for the sick have been very much improved. Having made these preliminary remarks, I come to the permanent arrangements proposed for the metropolitan workhouses. The inquiries of Dr. Markham, a skilled physician, well acquainted with hospital treatment and the proper working of infirmaries, have been continually directed to the state of the workhouse infirmaries in the metropolitan district and their requirements, and from his reports and other information, I came to the conclusion that there was nothing absolutely definite on the vexed question of floor and cubical space. I determined, therefore, to call in persons who were qualified to give a distinct opinion on the subject, in order that when I came before the House I might not have to argue on disputed theories; and I am sure the House will not say that in consulting the gentlemen I did, gentlemen whose attention had been specially called to the London Infirmaries, I did so with the view of confirming any preconceived notions of my own, especially as one gentleman who was applied to, but could not act, was well known to be strongly in favour of the largest amount of cubical space. That was Dr. Parkes. I applied to Sir Thomas Watson, President of the College of Physicians, to whom I cannot sufficiently express my gratitude for the zeal and ability with which he applied himself to this subject, as though it were the only one before him. There was also Dr. Acland, of Oxford, whose only object was for the public good, offered to come up and take part in the Committee, together with Dr. Sibson, Mr. Charles Hawkins, Mr. T. Holmes, Captain Galton, Dr. Randall, Dr. Smith, Dr. Markham, and Mr. Corbett. They visited the workhouses by day and by night—they tested the atmosphere of the sick wards in the different workhouse infirmaries, and thus obtained data upon which they have founded their conclusions, and I cannot but call attention to the fairness of the mode in which they have dealt with the question. They did not treat the question simply as one of theory, but went fully into the subject, ascertaining the kind of diseases prevalent in the workhouse infirmaries, and with the knowledge that there would be a removal of certain classes of sick—for example, small-pox and fever patients—from those infirmaries altogether, whose absence would, of course, make a material difference in the calculation. One point is remarkable enough. It is that however overcrowded these infirmaries may be, none of those diseases appear there which are known to result from overcrowding. There are no hospital diseases, and it has attracted attention abroad as well as at home how very few are the cases of puerperal fever, which so often decimate lying-in hospitals, and in France, I believe, cause death to an extent of which we have no conception. Even in our own lying-in hospitals these cases occur to a much larger extent than in the metropolitan workhouses. I will now read a few sentences which form the practical groundwork of the Report—

“The problem to be solved really is what is the amount of floor and cubical space which shall not be too little on the one hand, nor more than enough on the other—not too little for the health and comfort of the pauper inmates, sick or well, not too much for the means of the humblest ratepayer. This practical aspect of the question the Committee have deemed it their duty to keep steadily in view, always with an inclination, if the balance cannot be strictly adjusted, towards the side of the sick and poor. It is fit that these houses be made safe, decent, and commodious; it is neither necessary nor expedient that they be made inviting.”

Upon that basis Sir Thomas Watson and the gentlemen associated with him arrived at their principal conclusions. Before calling attention to those conclusions, I will refer for a moment to the enormous changes which have taken place in the metropolitan workhouses. They were originally built at an enormous cost, and I find that since 1834—I do not know what they had cost up to that time—upwards of £1,000,000 has been spent upon them. When they were built it was not contemplated that they should become mere asylums for the aged, the sick, and the infirm; but these are now the main occupants of the workhouses, and the able-bodied are practically almost unknown. Assuming that the able-bodied are only those under sixty—an unreasonable period, perhaps as many men are quite able-bodied when beyond that age—it appears that there are only 889 able-bodied men in the London workhouses, and of women about 2,000. Besides this, it must be remembered that at the time when this inquiry was instituted, great changes had arisen in the various theories formerly entertained upon these matters. Former Reports and recommendations made show that a very much smaller space was thought requisite for the sick than is now almost universally looked upon as desirable. Thus the condition of things is very different from that existing when these workhouses were designed. They were designed as workhouses under the new Poor Law to deter able-bodied persons from going into them; it is found that they do act, in a great degree, as a check in this way; but now they are places chiefly for the sick and aged poor, the very persons whom the country would wish to see well cared for. Then, the Poor Law Board itself does not seem to have been always of the same opinion respecting the cubical space and the nursing. Now the cry throughout the country and the metropolis is that you must have as many paid nurses as you can get; but in a Return moved for by the Earl of Carnarvon in the other House, occurs this letter, dated the 11th of February, 1850, in which the Poor Law Board urge the guardians at Croydon not to appoint too many paid nurses—

“Three at least of the paid servants in this hospital must be discontinued. In the greater number of country unions there is no paid nurse, and in none it is believed more than one. In pronouncing upon this point the Poor Law Board attach more weight to the results of experience than to the opinion of the medical officer of the Croydon Workhouse, though supported by that of three of his professional friends. If, for instance, the infirmary of the Wandsworth and Clapham union workhouse can be, as it is, perfectly well managed under one paid nurse, why should the medical officers say that five paid nurses are required in the much smaller infirmary of the Croydon Workhouse.”

I only quote that in order to show that we can only act up to the lights we have, and that some fifteen or sixteen years ago medical men and the Poor Law Board itself believed there was much less necessity for greater space, paid nurses, and other appliances than is now thought requisite. We should not, therefore, attack our predecessors unnecessarily upon this subject, because we should probably have acted at that time just as they did. I come now to the conclusions of the Committee. They say, respecting the classes of sick poor of whom I have spoken—

“The Committee, after full and anxious consideration of the subject, have recommended that a space of not less than 850 cubic feet on an average, with six feet across the beds, should be provided for each sick inmate; of not less than 1,300 feet for each ‘offensive case’ in the ‘separation’ wards; the infirm wards should have at least 500 feet with day room; the surgical wards, 850; and the lying-in-wards, 1,200; for general wards, 300 would be sufficient; but for fever and small-pox wards, 2,000, and that they should be removed to separate hospitals.”

But the great point upon which they dwell, and upon which the whole question turns, is ventilation. It is stated, upon authority which I cannot doubt, that, whatever amount of space you may have, if the ventilation be not good, all your expense and trouble are thrown away, and that it is idle to increase the space unless you improve the ventilation. Accordingly, the Committee gave great attention to this subject, and to the best mode of insuring proper ventilation. The appendices to the Report are not yet perfect; but I hope in the course of this week, or the beginning of the week after, to lay before the House all the data upon which these gentlemen have proceeded. The House will find them worthy of attention, and they show that you cannot by merely adding to space overcome the difficulty of obtaining fresh air. You must not give air to the patients cold or in draughts, because to these old people draughts would be more dangerous than overcrowding and heat; and if you give them warm air, you must have some artificial system by which the air is brought into proper condition so as to be adapted to their weak state. In one of the great hospitals in France—the Lariboisiere—2,000 cubic feet are allowed for every inmate, and yet from its defective ventilation it is said by Dr. Bristowe and Mr. Holmes, in their Report on Hospitals, to be worse than the old infirmary at Leeds. This space being then required by the Committee, and accepted by me as the data on which I am bound to proceed, I have made up my mind to act on these conclusions, and on them I shall proceed to legislate; and then the question arises, how is the space to be obtained? We have in the metropolitan workhouses about 26,240 persons. That excludes the inmates of the Richmond and Croydon Workhouses, which are not properly comprised within the metropolitan district, though within the inspecting powers of the metropolitan inspectors. There are temporarily disabled, 7,046; old and infirm, 13,685; able-bodied, 2,899; children above two years of age, 2,150; infants, 1,015. Out of the whole of these, 1,977 are imbeciles or lunatics, and form a separate and distinct class. Now, there is a very remarkable thing in these workhouses, which shows to their credit—I refer to the great age to which people may live in them. There have been as inmates for the period of one year and upwards persons above the age of 70 to the extent of 4,783; from 75 to 80, 3,812; from 80 to 90, 903. Those who have been from five to ten years inmates number 1,352, and those above ten years, 857. I saw in one of the workhouses, in the City of London union, what Sir George Lewis would have told us was an impossibility—an old man of 100 years of age. I believe this is a well-authenticated case, and judging from appearances he was likely to live for some time. Well, the question is, how am I to get room for all the sick poor of the metropolis? In the first place, I propose that the lunatics and imbeciles shall be removed and placed in separate establishments; then that the children above two years of age shall go to separate schools, and having done that, I fear I shall find myself still with a considerable deficiency of space under the new circumstances. We have to provide for 34,000 persons, including children. How is that to be done? It must be done by additional buildings. I propose to do it in accordance with the original intention of those who passed the Poor Law Act. So long ago as before the formation of the Gilbert Unions, a Resolution of the House was passed which shows what was in the mind of the House at that time; it was in favour of the establishment of

and it was evidently not supposed that the aged and infirm would be brought in who were principally receiving outdoor relief at that time. In 1834, what did the Commissioners say? Their intentions are given by Mr. Edwin Chadwick in a late number of Fraser's Magazine, where he says they never intended to have large workhouses, but separate ones for separate classes; but in carrying out their intention they seem to have come to a different conclusion; for, so far as I can see, no step was taken in that direction by the Commissioners at that time, and I suppose that Mr. Chadwick must have been overruled, and that an entirely different scheme was adopted. In their Report we find it recommended that the Central Board “Should be empowered to cause any number of parishes to be incorporated for the purpose of workhouse management, and for providing new workhouses where necessary, and to assign to those workhouses separate classes of poor. That the requisite classification and superintendence may be better obtained in separate buildings than under one roof. Each class might thus receive appropriate treatment; the old might enjoy their indulgencies without torment from the boisterous, the children be educated, and the able-bodied subjected to such courses of labour as will repel the indolent or vicious.”

That principle was, in fact, carried out in the District Schools Act, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, and I am taking no new step now in what I propose, for in 1841 Earl Russell, then Lord John Russell, together with Mr. Baring and Mr. Labouchere, brought in a Bill, in which it was provided that parishes or unions might have separate buildings for the insane and infirm poor, as well as separate schools for children. My main object is to classify the different inmates of workhouses, and I hope to do that, in the first instance, by building such an establishment or establishments as will be necessary for 2,000 lunatics and imbeciles. I find that my view on this subject is supported by the Lunacy Commissioners themselves; for in 1859 they published a supplement entirely devoted to this question of removing the lunatics and imbeciles from the workhouses. I will, for a moment, call the attention of the House to a few short passages. After pointing out the evils attendant on the detention of lunatics in workhouses, they say—

“To remedy many of the evils adverted to would, in our opinion, be impracticable, so long as insane patients are detained in workhouses, whether mixed with other inmates, or placed in distinct wards. The construction and management of workhouses present insurmountable obstacles to the proper treatment of the disease of insanity; and, therefore, the removal of the majority of the patients and the adoption of stringent measures to prevent the admission of others have become absolutely necessary. . . . To secure for the insane poor now improperly retained in workhouses due care and treatment elsewhere, it will be necessary to add greatly to the existing accommodation in county and borough asylums. Many of these are already upon so large a scale as not to admit of the necessary extension, while some are of a size much beyond that which is compatible with their efficient working. After full consideration of the subject in all its bearings, we are of opinion that the best mode of making provision for the insane poor who cannot be received into the present asylums will be by the erection of inexpensive buildings adapted for the residence of idiotic, chronic, and harmless patients, in direct connection with, or at a convenient distance from, the existing institutions. These auxiliary asylums, which should be under the management of the present visiting justices, would be intermediate between union workhouses and the principal curative asylums. The cost of building need not, in general, much exceed one-half of that incurred in the erection of ordinary asylums; and the establishment of officers and attendants would be upon a smaller and more economical scale than those required in the principal asylums. Without the adoption of measures such as we have suggested no effectual remedy can, in our opinion, be found for the present evils which so urgently press for correction.”

VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

I might quote at greater length; but those who are interested will find the whole Report worth perusal. I have spoken to one of the Commissioners, who tells me that it not unfrequently happens that persons who might be easily cured if put at once under medical treatment, are after a few days in a workhouse rendered absolutely incurable. I am sure that an evil of the kind to which I now refer is one to which this House will, if it be possible, apply a remedy. The next class to be removed is that of persons suffering from fever and small-pox. At present the great majority of those cases are sent to the hospitals specially devoted to the cure of these diseases; but it often happens that these hospitals are full, and I am bound to say that it is a matter of real necessity to provide some directly under Poor Law management. I would therefore propose to take or hire such buildings as will accommodate from 700 to 800 of those patients. I hope and believe that the time will come when by proper attention to the use of those remedies which science has discovered—vaccination on the one hand, and good sanitary arrangements on the other—we may be able to dispense with those hospitals almost entirely. We cannot, however, do so at present; and it is a most material thing to do for the people themselves, and for others in the workhouse, that to avoid risk and spreading the disease they should be removed. With respect to the children, almost all the metropolitan unions and parishes have district or separate schools. There are six instances in which we shall, no doubt, find no difficulty in obtaining their sanction—though we shall not require it—that the children shall be removed to separate schools like those which the inspectors have certified as being carried on on a most admirable system. In them the children are trained not only in the ordinary walks of industry, but the instrumental bands of some of our regiments are drawn from these schools. I am told that almost the whole band of one of our regiments came from the Stepney School. I have not been there, but am told that it is a most interesting sight to witness the training of the children. Now, am I to give up the existing workhouses? I think not. I believe, from the Reports made, that there are twenty-four of the present workhouses which may be easily and satisfactorily adapted for all classes of poor, except those which I have before described.

There is one thing, however, which we must peremptorily insist on — namely, the treatment of the sick in the infirmaries being conducted on an entirely separate system; because the evils complained of have mainly arisen from the workhouse management, which must to a great degree be of a deterrent character, having been applied to the sick, who are not proper objects for such a system. That is one thing which I should insist upon as an absolute condition. I propose, therefore, that power shall be given to combine such districts as the Poor Law Board may think proper—whether parishes and parishes, unions and unions, or unions and parishes—under a more complete system of inspection and control, and to interest in the conduct of those establishments persons who might be inclined to give them their attention. I propose that we should be able to appoint nominees on the Boards of Guardians, providing they never exceed one-third of the whole body, and are rated at not less than £100 a year. These nominees would, I hope, be persons taking a deep interest in the management of the establishments, and they would exercise a closer supervision than can be exercised by an inspector, whose visitation can only take place a certain number of times in a year. This proposal is, I am aware, a novel one, and will probably raise some objectors; but the House will bear in mind that in other parts of the country justices of the peace, acting practically as the largest ratepayers in the union, have seats at the Board. I propose that gentlemen residing in the several districts, and who are justices of the peace, though not perhaps filling that office in a metropolitan county, should be eligible to be placed upon these Boards, the nominee portion, however, never exceeding one-third of the whole. I know I shall be asked, from what I have seen in the press, and what has been said at public meetings, in respect to a plan that has been spoken of for workhouse and infirmary alteration, “Why do you not have six or seven large hospitals, each containing 1,000 inmates, and conducted upon the principle of hospitals pure and simple?” Now, there are several reasons why I do not propose this. In the first place, it would involve great expense and render useless the existing workhouses. Secondly, there is the objection which has been pointed out by many eminent medical men, that whereas in our smaller establishments, notwithstanding all their defects, gangrene, erysipelas, and puerperal fever do not intrude, in the large hospitals those diseases not only intrude, but are often permanently fixed there. Another objection is that these establishments ought to be readily accessible to the people of the district; because the people admitted into them are frequently in a transition state, and persons of advanced age are in the infirmary to-day and out to-morrow, in this week and out the next, and to remove them to and from a distant hospital would be a much more prejudicial course than to transfer them to an hospital near at hand, and capable, under proper discipline, of being as well conducted as the larger establishments. I hope under the new system to ensure, in cases where there are a certain number of sick, resident medical officers, in all cases separate and independent matrons, and paid nurses. But I know that we cannot by paying get trained nurses. Miss Nightingale says no such thing exists as a body of trained nurses at present: we must train them. Well, if we cannot get them, we must do the next best thing—we must use the best material available—we must pay persons responsible to us, and in that way having got the best we can, by having these separate establishments under suitable matrons, we may probably educate nurses for our needs. I believe that suitable persons could in many cases be found in the workhouses who would gladly seize the opportunity of earning a good livelihood. I believe also in the schools young persons might be trained to nursing, and thus provided with means of earning a living in their future life, while they conferred a great benefit upon the class from which they came. This, of course, would be a work of time; and, after all, the large hospitals would experience the same difficulty. I will here call the attention of the House to a very curious circumstance which is referred to in the last Report of the Poor Law Board. In Liverpool a gentleman, to his honour be it said, gave £3,000 to be divided into three sums of £1,000 a year to obtain for the Liverpool Workhouse trained and experienced nurses. Twelve were appointed on the recommendation of Miss Nightingale, and under them were eighty others. There was a miraculous change in the management of the workhouse infirmary. In the appearance of it it seemed that everything was being done on an improved system. But what did the intelligent master of the House report? For the first ten months—and I agree with him that that time is too short to give any sufficient proof of the working of the system—for the first ten months after the nurses came, he reported the discharges had been fewer and the deaths more frequent than under the old system. I confess that did to some extent dishearten me, and I have not at present any further return on the subject, though I have tried to obtain it. I am bound to say that Miss Nightingale was not quite satisfied with the administration of that department, although any one who visits the Liverpool Workhouse will see that it sets a pattern which is well worthy of being followed by similar establishments. I have another proposal to make with the view of securing more frequent visitation. It has been represented to me that there are no medical schools in which the treatment of chronic diseases can be studied; and I therefore propose that the Poor Law Board should have power to establish such schools, or more properly places of instruction, in connection with these hospitals, because the attendance of medical practitioners and their pupils would amount to an inspection of the most efficacious kind. Now, I think I have gone through the different classes that I propose to deal with in workhouses, and I ask, can nothing be done to prevent so many sick persons coming into the hospitals? I have had inquiries made on that subject, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman opposite will join me in admitting the debt which is owing to an officer of the Poor Law Board, Mr. Lambert, for the enormous assistance he gave them in the arrangement of statistics last year, and I have to thank him for the earnest and laborious assistance which he has afforded me in connection with the changes I propose. Though he had well earned a complete rest after having devoted himself to the preparation of the elaborate Returns that were laid before Parliament, I asked him, on his taking his holiday, if he would go to Ireland and make inquiries as to the administration of the dispensary system there. He did so, and has made a Report, which I have laid upon the table; and on that I propose to found a system which I believe calculated to diminish the amount of serious sickness among the poor. Half the pauperism of this country begins in sickness. I think it a most unsatisfactory system that such cases as this should occur constantly:—A child goes to the district medical officer, says some one at home is ill, and describes the symptoms. Medicine is sent with the child, without the medical officer having visited the patient. It may do harm, or it may do good; but I think the system contrary to common sense. Cases have come before me where medicine is continued to be sent frequently while the medical officer has not seen or seldom seen the patient. Not long ago a case occurred in the metropolis of this kind:—A daughter came to the medical officer, described pains, and medicine was sent to the mother; she died, and it was found she was suffering from quite a different complaint to that to which the medicine was intended to cure. I know of a workhouse in the North of England—I will not mention it—where they have what they call house medicine placed in a pauper's hands, and whoever wants it applies and gets it, and the demand seems good, for though the workhouse is a small one, the inmates consume a gallon a week. The medical officer says it does them no harm; the master says it has a great effect. The absence of disastrous consequences from medicines thus sent upon mere guess seems to prove that they must be at least harmless; but more is required. Now, to remedy this loose system, I propose that dispensaries be established in different parts of the metropolis, and that in all cases the medical men should write a prescription. It may be said that this is a cumbersome system; but it is carried out in Paris and in Ireland, where it answers exceedingly well, and prevents a great deal of sickness which otherwise would have to be treated in the hospitals. Mr. Lambert went to inquire into the matter. I do not propose to read at length his report; but if I read extracts from it it will be for the advantage of the House, for I am unable to give better reasons for this enactment than he has given. Dr. Rogers, in his evidence before the Relief Committee, suggested that the authorities should find the drugs, and not the medical officers. I propose to adopt that course; the drugs are to be found. I cannot help thinking that will remove from the medical man a great temptation. We shall secure good drugs; and when I come to speak of the mode of paying for them the House will see that the plan we propose will, or at least ought to, obtain for us the best drugs possible. The advantages of this system are stated by Mr. Lambert in better words than I myself could employ—

“It insures for the destitute sick poor a sufficient supply of all necessary and proper medicine and medical appliances. It enables those who are not confined within doors to obtain medical advice at fixed hours, and within a convenient distance from their homes. It insures for those who are unable to go out medical attendance, and enables them to obtain their medicines promptly. It affords facilities for vaccination, as well as for medical relief generally, by establishing fixed places at which it is well known that the medical officers must attend at stated hours.”

The next, I think a most important matter, which some of my hon. Friends from Ireland will no doubt be able to confirm; it is that nothing so much tended to check the recent outbreak of cholera in Ireland as the power of expansion which there is in the dispensary system. Mr. Lambert goes on to say—

“It provides an organization always ready, and capable of expansion if necessary, to meet any outbreak of epidemic disease with promptness; while, at the same time, it is calculated to prevent disease becoming epidemic by early treatment, and by procuring the adoption of precautionary measures in any locality which may be threatened. These benefits have recently been largely realized in Ireland in reference to cholera.”

I think it a most important point that when a person is removed from outdoor to indoor relief his prescriptions should go with him; so that the medical man in charge of the case may have the opportunity of seeing what the course of treatment has been—

“By preserving a record of the medical treatment in every case it furnishes a test of both the skill and attention of the medical officer. It prevents that conflict between interest and duty which must so often arise in the mind of the medical officer when he himself is required to provide medicines out of his salary.”

I think the reasons I have just read are reasons of great force and weight. In attempting to give effect to them it will, of course, be necessary that the Poor Law Board should have power to deal with all contracts entered into with existing medical officers; because I am sure the House, in a proceeding of this kind, would wish to see all those who have hitherto given their services dealt with justly and honourably. To another provision which it will be necessary to make in this Bill the attention of the House was called by the Report of the Committee which sat from 1861 to 1864, and that is as to doing away, as far as practicable, with Local Acts in the metropolis. At present there are ten places under Local

Acts in the metropolis, and we propose that they should be brought just as much under the authority of the Poor Law Board as any of the rest. At the present there is a nominal audit, but the audit in some of these cases is worthless. I trust that the House, with the Report of the Committee from 1861 to 1864 before them, and with all the facts and reasoning in its favour, will carry that part of the Bill—the abolition of the Local Acts—so far as they relate to Poor Law administration in the metropolis. Now I come to a point which will be more interesting to some hon. Members sitting opposite than any other part of the Bill. I have been urged and invited by a great deputation, by pamphlets, and by letters innumerable, to state whether I am prepared to equalize poor rates throughout the metropolis. Upon that subject I will not keep the House in suspense, because I will say at once that I am not prepared to make such a proposition; but I am prepared to do a good deal, I will not say towards equalizing those rates, but towards distributing charges now levied separately upon the various localities. It is true that this metropolis is in a certain sense one altogether; but every one must see, I think, that there is no place in the world with more varied interests or more unmistakably divided into different districts than the metropolis. I find one gentleman proposing, for instance, twelve municipal establishments, and another proposing that London should be divided into all sorts of districts with distinct machinery; so that it is quite clear that London is felt to be separated into various and distinct divisions. And I cannot get over this: how, if you once equalize the rates of the metropolis, are you to provide for a central management? You must have a paid management, and you must do away with local management altogether. If not, how are you to put a proper check and control on the expenditure? I am quite sure of this, that by such a change, instead of bringing down the rates to a certain amount, you would have a very great increase in the present rate of expenditure. I could not help remarking the other day at the deputation how many gentlemen said they were a great deal less liberal than they should be if they had the means of putting their hands into the pockets of their wealthy neighbours. I quite admit that would be the result. It is clear, at all events, that the deputation looked to a much larger expenditure. And I am not now expressing any opinion of my own as to the sufficiency of their present expenditure in some respects—as to outdoor relief, for instance. But I believe that a great paid system for 3,000,000 people would utterly fail, though perhaps it would become a great department, and finally overtop the Department over which I have the honour to preside. If, on the other hand, the administration were intrusted to the Poor Law Board, it would occasion conflicts and difficulties greater than any that have hitherto arisen. Another difficulty in the way of equalizing the rates, though that certainly might be overcome, lies in the question of uniformity of assessment. At this moment the rateable value of the metropolis is put at £15,000,000. How much of that is ascertained by the Union Assessment Committees? Why, as to between £9,000,000 and £10,000,000 of that amount, we have no means of ascertaining whether the value is properly estimated or not. It is ascertained without Union Assessment Committees, and is assessed in parishes as they please; and it may be, for aught I know, that the assessments may be so managed as to cause much of the evil which is complained of. The Poor Law Committee did not make any recommendations on this subject. They called attention to it, and say there are peculiar circumstances in the metropolis. There are peculiar circumstances in the metropolis, and I think they are such as to justify me in proceeding to the length I propose to do in distributing the charges. The Union Chargeability Act got rid of a great number of difficulties, particularly in the City of London, where, I think, one parish was rated at 2*d.* in the pound, and another rated as high as 9*s.* These inequalities have been remedied, and the City of London Union is now equally assessed, and pays, no doubt, a very moderate sum, having regard to its wealth, as compared with the surrounding districts. The charges of the houseless poor have all been thrown on the common fund of the metropolis. I do not think the time has yet come for forming a definite opinion on that question. I think the time will come when it will be necessary to inquire into the working of that Act. It has answered to a great extent in this way. It has provided that no person need be houseless in this metropolis. It has trebled the number of persons who used to apply for admission to the casual wards of work-houses; but I find that, although the estimate, in point of numbers, has been largely exceeded, the actual cost of the wards and relief given is not beyond the one-eighth of a penny regarded at the time as sufficient for the purpose. This charge is not a very large one, yet it has been instrumental in introducing a new principle into the metropolis. I told the House I had been petitioned repeatedly by persons at the East End of the metropolis to do something to bring them into a better condition. Curiously enough, I received only yesterday from one of the parishes that is rated highest—Whitechapel—a memorial on the subject; and, if the framers of that memorial had looked into the Bill which I propose to submit, they could not have put forward more accurately the points which they desired that I should take up, both as to the direction and extent of the changes that are recommended. I will not read that memorial at length; but I may state its substance. The memorialists

“Consider that the following provisions leave each union still to be responsible and chargeable with precisely those expenses and their administration where only indiscrete and corrupt expenditure could occur, and so supply a guarantee to all parties against the increase of pauperism by ignorant, partial, and profuse bestowal of the public funds.”

They propose that we should put certified and district schools upon the common fund; and that lunatics, imbeciles, the salaries and wages of permanent officials, fees for vaccination, small-pox and fever hospitals, and so forth, should be charged to the common fund. That is exactly what I propose to do. I propose, in the first instance, to charge to the common fund the lunatics and imbeciles. I cannot consider that an unreasonable step. When the settlement of these persons cannot be ascertained, they are charged to the county in county asylums, and counties find the buildings, and it cannot be contended that lunatics belong more to one part of the metropolis than they do to another, though all have an equal interest in seeing their necessities adequately and comfortably relieved. Besides, it is one of those items which cannot be jobbed; you cannot make lunatics for the purpose. It is not as in the case of ordinary sick persons, who in hospital would be charged to one fund, and out of hospital to another. Again, there are many reasons why the salaries of the medical officers, the officers of dispensaries, and the charge for medicines should be a charge on the common fund. At this moment half the medical officers' salaries are charged upon the Consolidated Fund. This was done by Sir Robert Peel, and in practice it has been attended with no evil consequences. And in dealing with the salaries of these gentlemen, and placing them upon the common fund, a check remains with the Poor Law Board, without whose consent no salary can be given. [Sir GEORGE GREY: The common fund of the whole metropolis?] The common fund of the whole metropolis. In speaking of it, I have called it shortly "the common fund." Then, as regards the salaries. I do not mean the salaries of assistant overseers and collectors, but the salaries of all officers actually engaged in the administration of poor relief ought, I think, to be placed on the common fund. In many cases, also, I think when this is done improvements may be introduced. Poor persons have to travel frequently to great distances to obtain outdoor relief, and it is very desirable that there should be more relieving officers, or more points at which they can obtain assistance. At present I believe the very applications for assistance often bring evils in their train; for by crowding together in large numbers at a particular point a long detention is caused, the poor have their sickness or infirmity much increased by being kept in the snow or the rain for an unreasonable time. Registration and vaccination expenses I would put on the common fund. These are small charges, but it is most desirable that the system of which they form part should be made as effective as possible, with a view of getting rid of that horrible and disastrous complaint, the small-pox. For the same reason I would establish the small-pox and fever hospitals, and pay the expenses out of the common fund. Small-pox and fever are not things the relief of which can be traded in. Nobody will go into a small-pox or fever hospital who has not one of those diseases. Patients such as those endanger the health of the whole population if they are not properly cared for, and if means be not taken to prevent the infection from being spread. I now come to the children's schools. Great efforts are at present being made on behalf of education, some calling for compulsory education, and some for other systems. The district schools, and certified schools, and schools under the Inspectors of the Poor Law

Board, are working admirably as separate schools. I propose by this Bill that we should have separate schools, and that the maintenance of the children shall be paid out of the common fund of the metropolis. The building will be provided by the district. I have now to consider what all these charges will amount to. I will not go into the details now, because I shall lay on the table papers that will give the fullest information on the subject. I propose to lay the Bill at once on the table; and I am sure that hon. Members will be able to judge better of details from reading the clauses than they would be from any description which I might give them. It is right, however, that I should answer some of the questions that will probably be put to me. The City of London is the richest union in the metropolis. What would be the effect on the City of London Union of these additional charges on the common fund. They would increase the rate by 3½d. in the pound. I will take an extreme case on the opposite side—St. George's, Southwark. They would relieve that union by reducing the rate from about 3s. to about 2s. in the pound. Adding the whole of the additional or new charges which I think will arise from this measure if you adopt it, a sum of about £60,000 per annum will have to be raised. Now, 1d. rate raises £61,000; so I think that at that sum the metropolis may purchase a very great improvement at a reasonably cheap rate. Those improvements, if the House should think them improvements, may be effected at so cheap a rate as 1d. in the pound; and, although this rate will fall on the impoverished as well as on the richer unions, it is to be borne in mind that the former will be relieved by the allocation of expenses with which they are now charged on the common fund. In order that the money to be raised should be devoted to a common fund it will be necessary, as in the case of the police rate, to appoint a receiver under the Poor Law Board. And instead of going to the Metropolitan Board of Works, which should have nothing to do with the management of the poor, I propose to relieve them of their present duty of obtaining the funds for the houseless poor, and to enact that the Poor Law Board shall issue warrants for the different rates; that the receiver who shall give proper security, shall pay the money into the Bank of England, and that he shall distribute the funds according to the just proportions due to the several unions and districts. I suppose it will be asked, further, what will be the cost of the buildings? I have already said that; having regard to the statement of the Lunacy Commissioners, the lunatics for whom the Bill proposes to provide cannot be looked on as the ordinary class of lunatics who have some chance of being cured. Those who have a chance of cure will go to the ordinary asylums; and where the cases are chronic some patients might be transferred thence to the new buildings, instead of being kept where they would only be in the way of inmates more needing special care. If I give £50 a head as the cost of the asylums, there being 2,000 lunatics, the cost would be £100,000. Of course, I speak with great reserve on this subject. I know that the price of building has risen very much; but, looking at all the circumstances, I believe we may easily provide such buildings as we require for that sum. In addition to this, I think we should have to provide for at least 2,000 more sick; and, putting down the cost of the building necessary for their accommodation at £60 a head, we have £120,000 more. Then there would be the additional school building, which would cost from £50,000 to £70,000, and the fever and small-pox hospitals, which would take from £50,000 to £70,000 more. It would thus appear that the entire buildings would cost about £360,000, or say, in round numbers, £400,000. When it is borne in mind that many unions of the metropolis would be obliged to build under present circumstances, and that some of them are at this moment building, it will be seen that a very considerable expenditure for new buildings will take place, even should this Bill not be passed. For instance, the site on which St. Martin's Workhouse now stands has been bought by the Government, and the guardians will be able to build on a better scale with the money which they will receive for the present house. I think, therefore, that I am safe in saying £400,000 would be the extreme limit. It would be paid off in yearly sums. The payment for the first year would be £40,000; but the annual payments would become less after that, and for such a sum two-thirds of 1*d.* in the pound over the metropolis would be the required rating. There is one other provision in the Bill to which I wish to allude before concluding. It is one conferring on the Poor Law Board a power similar to one vested in the Irish Poor Law Commissioners, and which, though I believe never exercised, has been found effective in producing the desired results. Though I intend to submit to the House another measure applying to England generally, in respect of certain minor points, we have thought it right at once to ask Parliament to give power to the Poor Law Board to appoint proper officers in the event of the guardians or managers declining to do so. Though I believe it never will be necessary to exercise this provision, I think it will be advisable to give some less expensive and more speedy remedy than that of a mandamus in case of neglect to appoint nurses or other officers. Knowing this power to be vested in the Poor Law Board, I think those intrusted with the management of unions will always so act as that it will be unnecessary ever to exercise it. I have now only to thank the House for the patience with which they have listened to me. I can assure the House that I have not dealt with this question without having given the subject much thought and consideration. I have endeavoured as far as possible to come to a just and satisfactory conclusion, feeling as I did very deeply the responsibility cast upon me lest, while endeavouring to mitigate existing evils, I might take any step which should lead to the worst of all evils—an increase of pauperism in the country. I have limited, as far as seemed to me possible to do so, the burdens to be thrown on the poorer parishes. I feel very much for those parishes, and I cannot help throwing out a suggestion as to what might probably be done at a future time in the way of exceptional relief. Without any injury to our Poor Law system might not power be given to the Poor Law Board in the event of any sudden and extraordinary calamity—such as an outbreak of cholera—to raise a general rate, not exceeding 1*d.* in the pound, over all the parishes of London? In this way a sum of £60,000 or £70,000 might be at once placed at the disposal of the authorities for the relief of the afflicted. I only throw that out as a suggestion. It appears to me that it would afford us a means of meeting some of the evils with which we have had to contend, without leading to that still greater evil to which I have just referred. I feel satisfied that this Bill will be received by hon. Members on the Opposition side in a spirit of forbearance and impartiality. This is a matter to which no party feeling can attach itself. We have only one object in view, which is the benefit of this metropolis—to do a service both to the rate-payers and to the suffering poor, whether in workhouse or receiving outdoor relief. I commend the measure to the kind consideration of the House, assuring them that we are not so wedded to its every detail as not to give the utmost attention to any Amendment which may be proposed; but I would earnestly beg of hon. Members who wish for larger changes to take care lest in grasping at a shadow they should lose the substance which we now offer to the House. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. AYRTON expressed the satisfaction he felt at finding that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, at so early a period of his political career, had applied himself to a consideration of this important question, which, he was sorry to say, had been too long left in its present state. He could not forget that it was now ten years since he had brought the subject under the notice of the House; and in vain had he been looking for some action on the part of the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presided. Even if it was true that the descriptions of what took place in some of the workhouses of our metropolis were somewhat exaggerated, he was glad that by the publication of those accounts the press had directed public attention to the administration of the Poor Law. If writers of equal ability to those who had described the workhouses attended at the bedsides of the poor who died in private houses, they would find material for reports as painful as those they had made on the condition of the unfortunate poor people who had had to seek indoor relief. He believed that the true source of all the evils connected with the administration of the relief to the poor in the metropolis, had been the injustice attendant on the unequal distribution of the charges in the different parishes. As long as that injustice prevailed, it would be impossible to deal with the consequences which resulted from it. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman had recognised that principle, and had proposed to extend the charge for those improvements through the entire community by means of what he termed a common fund. He was not going at present to complain of the measure of justice which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to accord; for last year he ventured to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor that perhaps the best way of meeting the question of the equalization of the poor rates, would be not to attempt at once to subvert the whole administration of the Poor Law of the metropolis by one measure, but to proceed upon the principle of bringing from time to time other and different classes of the poor on a common fund as might be found convenient and practicable. The right hon. Gentleman had, undoubtedly, taken several classes with whom it would be comparatively easy to deal, and he appeared to have stopped at the very point where the real difficulties of the case commenced. Now, he did not complain of that; because if this tentative measure were found to answer, the system might be extended, and, assisted by the light of experience, they might extend the uniform charge to classes remaining excluded. There was only one point to which he wished to draw attention. The right hon. Gentleman had not explained very clearly what was to be the mode of administering the common fund. It was suggested that there were to be district Boards, and if so we should be going back to a plan which had been proposed twice before, and which on each occasion turned out a failure. For his part, he thought it a pity that the attempt should be made for the third time. There would be no merit in dividing London into new districts; but what was wanted was one entire administration which would deal with the whole subject, superintend the whole of the distribution of relief, in those cases which were embraced in the present Bill. Just in proportion as it was attempted to re-combine and re-group parishes and unions, would unnecessary expense be entailed, and the measure be rendered inefficient. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that, if one Board only were established, it would eclipse and overshadow his own; but that was a rather narrow view to take of the question, and he might depend upon it that, as long as he presided with ability over his own Board, it would not be overshadowed by any other. At all events, he did not think the question ought to be embarrassed by any consideration of that kind. The question was, whether it were desirable to have one Board to superintend the infirmaries, dispensaries, and lunatic asylums, or whether there should be a multiplicity of Boards. The magistrates of the county were quite equal to deal with the lunatic asylums of Middlesex, and he saw no reason why a Central Board should not deal with the infirmaries, dispensaries, and lunatic asylums in the metropolis. He did not propose to discuss the practical bearings of the measure on the present occasion; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not pledge himself too much to that part of his Bill. In conclusion, he expressed his opinion that we should do well to deal with this question by degrees; for, if the system now proposed were found to answer, it might be extended at any future time. He was desirous before he sat down to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the great attention which he had given to the subject, and to express the pleasure with which he had listened to his able speech.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD wished, in the first place, to tender his most grateful thanks to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) for the spirit in which he had approached this question; and, in the second, to assure him that the sole reason why the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers) had not been present that evening was that severe indisposition compelled him to remain at home. With regard to the various details of the scheme, he could only say that every portion of it would receive the most impartial consideration on his part. He only wished now to tender his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for having so earnestly addressed himself to this important subject, and to state why the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had not been present to hear his speech.

MR. BRADY also thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the industry and ability he had displayed since he had presided over the Poor Law Board, and had brought to bear upon this important question. It was quite clear that he had paid great attention to it, and had considered it in a spirit of perfect impartiality. The alterations now proposed were highly important in a medical point of view, and would remedy many of the evils the pressure of which was now most severely felt. After paying a high compliment to the editor of The Lancet for the considerable expense to which he had put himself for the purpose of collecting accurate and ample information on this subject, the hon. Member proceeded to say that he hoped medical officers would for the future be freed from the influences which had hitherto been brought to bear by the guardians most injuriously upon the proper performance of their duties. They were at the disposal of the guardians, who might dismiss them or continue them in their offices as they thought fit; and it was well known that in many instances medical officers had been turned out or harassed out of their office because they were disposed to order for the patients more nourishment than the guardians approved of. As long as this was allowed the administration of the medical department of the Poor Law must continue to be unsatisfactory. The medical officers ought also to be better paid. If this were done the complaints which had been heard of the inefficient performance of their duties would not have to be repeated; but it was unreasonable to suppose that, while they were miserably underpaid, they would be found ready to devote their time and to endanger their lives cheerfully in attendance upon the poor. It was a piece of injustice to the poor so long as their medical men continued to be thus underpaid.

MR. LOCKE said, that as he had always taken the deepest interest in this subject, he was unwilling to let the opportunity pass without tendering to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) his thanks for the introduction of the Bill, and likewise for the pains which he had taken in investigating the question, and the great ability he had displayed in introducing his Bill. When he waited upon the right hon. Gentleman with the deputation which had been referred to by him that evening, he saw that the sympathies and views of the right hon. Gentleman were sound, and that whatever was done would be done in the right direction. The right hon. Gentleman had only stopped short of carrying out the complete proposal of the deputation—namely, the equalization of the poor rates in the metropolis, because he thought certain difficulties would arise from there being no sufficient check upon a too lavish expenditure in the relief of the poor. He believed, however, that as soon as the present plan was adopted, it would be found that the principle of the Bill might be safely extended to the equalization of the whole poor rate throughout the metropolis. The Report of the Poor Relief Committee did not, indeed, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, contain a direct recommendation in favour of the equalization of the poor rates of the metropolis; but it stated that the circumstances of the metropolis were so peculiar that in any legislation to extend the area of charge or management it would be necessary to have regard to those circumstances. With respect to some of those peculiarities which pressed so heavily on the poorer parishes, there was no doubt that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman would provide a remedy, though he did not pledge himself to all the details of the Bill, which would be matter for great consideration when they were before the House. But in the principle of the Bill he heartily agreed; and, with other hon. Gentlemen, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the great labour he had bestowed on the subject, and the distinguished ability with which he had treated it, and for the proposals contained in the Bill, which would be appreciated and approved of by the whole metropolis.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that all must admire the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman had approached a difficult subject, the clear and lucid statement he had made, and the tone and temper in which he had brought the matter forward.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the establishment in the Metropolis of Asylums for the Sick, Insane, and other classes of the Poor, and of Dispensaries; and for the distribution over the Metropolis of portions of the charge for Poor Relief; and for other purposes relating to Poor Relief in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GATHORNE HARDY and Mr. EABLE.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WALPOLE, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill for facilitating in certain cases the proceedings of the Commissioners appointed to make inquiry respecting trades unions, and other associations of employers of workmen, said: The Bill, Sir, I now ask leave to introduce is of a somewhat unusual character, and the circumstances which have given rise to it are also peculiar. I will briefly refer to them. Many hon. Gentlemen will recollect that in the autumn of last year a very violent outrage was committed in Sheffield, an attempt having been made to blow up the house of a Mr. Ferneyhough, with its occupants. Large rewards were offered for the detection of the perpetrators of this atrocious deed. The Government, in answer to appeals made to it, also offered a reward, and a promise of pardon to any one concerned, except the actual perpetrator, who would give information on the subject. All these offers and promises failed, and the perpetrator of the deed is still unknown. In consequence of the failure of these efforts to discover the guilty parties, application was made to the Government, on the part of those most intimately connected with the trade of Sheffield, that extraordinary measures should be taken for the detection not merely of this offence, but of similar crimes before committed. A deputation attended at the Home Office, headed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), and he stated, on the part of the inhabitants of Sheffield, how earnestly they desired that the Government should take some steps for the discovery of this deed. It was pointed out by the deputation that other and repeated offences had been committed of a similar character, some of less, some of equal atrocity; and there was placed in my hand a list of 200 cases within the last twenty years, in which it was alleged that workmen had been assailed. First of all they had been warned by threatening letters, then they had their tools injured and their leather bands destroyed, and finally incendiarism and gunpowder had been introduced when the other warnings had been found to be insufficient. Under these circumstances, it was pressed upon the Government that even if only to prevent suspicion resting upon the wrong persons, it would be necessary to confer extraordinary powers, and that the Government should apply for them to the Legislature. This deputation was followed by another, headed also by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield, from what are commonly known as trades unions, which pressed upon the Government with equal earnestness the importance of taking extraordinary measures for discovering the real perpetrators of these outrages. I think I cannot do better than read to the House the words of the hon. Member for Sheffield, addressed to myself on the part of those who then attended with him. Speaking of the trades unions, he said—

“They believe that a full inquiry will prove that trades unions have been and are of great benefit to the working classes and through them to the country at large; that they are wholly innocent of any such foul proceedings as are laid to their charge; that their conduct has been wise and just to their employers as well as themselves; and that the more searching is the inquiry the more patent and obvious will appear the wisdom of those who have directed the proceedings of these unions, and the immense advantage to trade and the country at large from their existence. Such being their firm conviction, they earnestly pray you to accede to their request, and that you will move the House of Commons to pass a law creating a Commission with ample powers to make all requisite inquiries into this most momentous subject, and that you will support such Motion with all the powers of this Government."

I felt it to be my duty to communicate to my Colleagues the appeal thus made to me, and to submit to them that an application of this kind, coming both from the employers and the employed, rendered it necessary to consider first whether Parliament should not be applied to for extraordinary powers with reference to these outrages; and, in the second place, if such an application were made, whether the opportunity ought not to be taken of inquiring fully and completely into the working of trades unions and similar associations. The Government considered that such an appeal could not be resisted; and the only question, therefore, in their minds was whether the inquiry should be limited, in the first instance, to the occurrences at Sheffield, or should embrace the whole subject to which I have referred. As regards Sheffield, I think it will be admitted on all sides that, in the face of the double appeal made to us, we could not but accede to the desired investigation. That town is, in some respects, peculiarly circumstanced with regard to trades unions. I am afraid I must say, in passing, that it has obtained an unenviable notoriety for outrages of this description. But there are also circumstances peculiar to it which make it the most advantageous place in which an inquiry such as that now proposed could take place. In Sheffield there are a large number of trades unions; many of these are in association with others, and there are some trades without unions at all. There is also this further peculiarity, that the difference between the workman or artisan and the employer or capitalist is less broad and distinct, at least, in the outlery trade than it is in most of the other manufacturing districts of the country. The line between the employers and the employed in the great majority of the large manufacturing towns is plain and obvious. The capitalists provide everything except the labour. But in the outlery trade the artisan not merely furnishes his labour, but he rents what are called the wheels, and in that respect he is master of his own time and of his own resources. These wheels, connected by bands with the water wheel, are thus rented by the artisan, the result being that in this double capacity—partly as owner of the wheel and partly as workman—he is not merely in those capacities master of his own time, but he is also capable of sustaining severe injuries at the hands of any discontented workmen who may think they have reason to find fault with him. A common way of showing resentment against a fellow-workman is to deprive him of the tools of his trade, steal his wheel-bands, or disable his machinery in other respects. At last, if these proceedings prove ineffectual, recourse is had to the more flagrant outrages to which I have already referred. In this state of affairs it is impossible for Parliament to shut its eyes to the importance of having a thorough investigation set on foot, especially in the face of the applications which have been made by all parties for inquiry. The Government have therefore arrived at the conclusion, in regard to Sheffield, that it is for the benefit of all concerned that special investigation should take place; and I have now to ask leave to bring in the Bill of which I have given notice. But this further point was brought specifically under my notice by two deputations, headed by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield—namely, if you have an inquiry at all, has not the time come when the fullest inquiry should be made into these trades unions and other associations? Is it not desirable that the inquiry should be in the largest and most comprehensive form, so that the evil or good of these unions may equally be brought out, and the law complained of on the one side or the other so improved, as to contribute to the mutual benefit both of the employers and the employed? That was the grave and difficult question submitted to the Government in the course of the autumn; and it appeared to the Government that there were two reasons why such an inquiry would be most advantageous. The first is the uncertain, and I may say, after looking very fully into the question, unsatisfactory state of the law. The second is that the subject is but ill understood by those who are most interested in it. The fuller the inquiry, the better will the subject be understood by the country. The facts of the case being brought to the knowledge of an impartial tribunal, it will then report to the Queen and to Parliament the result of their inquiries before legislation is attempted. These are the reasons which appear to me to be absolutely irresistible in the present state of affairs in favour of such an inquiry. Upon both I may take the liberty of adding a few words. The law of this country, independent of the common law—the doctrine of conspiracy—is entirely based upon the Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of George IV. Before that Act was passed, from the earliest period, the law relating to combination was in every respect adverse to the workman. The earliest statute relating to combination was passed in the reign of Edward III. From that time to the reign of George III. a series of statutes were passed prohibiting combinations, either for the purpose of raising wages, or for the purpose of limiting the hours of work, or for the purpose of attempting to control any manufacture, or for imposing restraints upon masters, either with regard to the hire of assistance or the employment of labourers. The object of some of these statutes nobody probably would find fault with. But the object of others was a direct interference with the freedom of labour. It was under these circumstances that in the year 1824 Mr. Hume obtained the appointment of a Committee of this House, which went fully into the whole subject, and that Committee reported that the law respecting these combinations had not prevented them—that in spite of the law combinations existed—that they existed in the worst form in which combinations could exist—namely, as secret societies with secret oaths. The Committee drew from these facts the natural conclusion that such a state of the law could not properly be maintained. The Act of 6 Geo. IV., framed on the Report, enabled workmen, if they could, to obtain from their employers higher wages, or more limited hours of work; but, at the same time, the Committee condemned in toto any attempt to continue such combinations, if they were to exercise by violence or threat any restraint upon the freedom of others in the prosecution of their work or in the employment of labour. This is clearly shown by the Resolutions of the Committee, the preamble of the statute, and the speech of Mr. Wallace, the President of the Board of Trade, who introduced the Bill. The seventh Resolution came to by Mr. Hume's Committee runs as follows:—

“That it is the opinion of this Committee that masters and workmen should be freed from such restrictions as regard the rate of wages and the hours of working, and be left at perfect liberty to make such agreements as they may mutually think proper.”

And the eleventh Resolution asserts—

“That it is absolutely necessary, when repealing the combination laws, to enact such a law as may efficiently and by summary process punish either workmen or masters who by threats, intimidation, or acts of violence should interfere with that perfect freedom which ought to be allowed to each party of employing his labour and capital in the manner he may deem most advantageous.”

The preamble of the statute states that—

“It is expedient to make further provision as well for the security and personal freedom of individual workmen in the disposal of their skill and labour as for the security of the property and persons of masters and employers.”

Mr. Wallace's remarks are in the same spirit as the Resolutions and preamble which I have quoted, and I look upon his speech as the key to the measure which was passed. Mr. Wallace said—

“He was no friend to the principle of the laws which had been repealed. He did not wish to see them re-enacted, but he wished that the common law as it had stood before should be again brought into force. . . . By that law sufficient powers were given to the workmen for the preservation of their own interests. They were permitted to meet for the purpose of obtaining an increase of their wages; but if they went beyond this, and attempted to mix up any intimidation of others in their schemes, it was going too far. The object of the Bill was to keep up this distinction, and everything beside was left to the operation of the common law. . . . The principle of the Bill now before the House was to make all associations illegal, excepting those for the purpose of settling such amount of wages as would be a fair remuneration to the workman.”—[2 Hansard, xiii. 1404.]

Mr. Wallace should have added—and no doubt it was his intention to add—that associations would also be permitted for the purpose of settling such amount of wages, and also regulating such hours of labour, as would be a fair remuneration for the workman. That was the object of the Bill. The principle was simply this—to draw a distinction between the use and the abuse of that liberty which capital and labour had an equal right to claim, and that was, I have no doubt, the principle which was to be substituted for the law which existed before. The desire of Parliament was to give liberty to labourers to act in combination when their object was legitimate and reasonable, and to restrain them from combining to abuse the liberty accorded to them. It was intended, therefore, to leave untouched the common law, and nothing was done with reference to that in the Act of Parliament. The consequence has been that in leaving untouched that part of the subject questions soon arose which complicated the matter very much—namely, how far the common-law doctrine of conspiracy was applicable to trades unions. There are three points which show how unsatisfactory is the state of the law at the present moment. First, with reference to the common-law doctrine of conspiracy, a dictum was laid down by one of the Judges—that although a person, a single individual, might do an act which would not subject him to an indictment, yet if two or more individuals did the same act they might subject themselves to an indictment for conspiracy. And the illustration given by the learned Judge was taken from the wages question—namely, that a single workman was perfectly at liberty to insist that he would not work unless he had a certain amount of wages; yet if two or three workmen combined for that purpose, in the eye of the law it amounted to a conspiracy. No doubt a more liberal and a more just interpretation has since been adopted; but still the law is not clearly defined, for according to that interpretation, although it is truly said that every conspiracy implies a combination, every combination does not necessarily imply a conspiracy; and I believe the law at this moment may be taken to be that a combination to constitute a conspiracy must be the combination of persons to do an unlawful act, or to do an act which may be lawful by unlawful means. But, then, the House will see that that very definition of combination and conspiracy leaves one point entirely uncertain, and it is owing to that uncertainty that considerable difficulty has arisen in several recent cases, and especially in the last case. The uncertainty is as to what is and what is not unlawful. As applicable to this question, there are two cases of great importance—the one that of Hilton v. Eekersley, and the other that of Hornby v. Close. In the former case several employers bound themselves in a bond, under a penalty of £500, not to employ workmen except upon certain terms and conditions. One of those who had subscribed acted in opposition to the agreement, and an action was brought against him to recover the penalty to which he had rendered himself liable. The Court decided that, although there was nothing in the bond or the subscription to render it so illegal as to subject the subscriber to criminal proceedings, yet, inasmuch as the nature of the bond implied a restraint on trade and manufacture, it was illegal in another sense—that is, it could not be enforced in a civil court. The case of Hornby v. Close was just the reverse of this. In that case a number of working men, forming themselves into a society, had placed their money in the hands of a treasurer, and brought an action to recover the money. The claim was resisted on the ground that, though some of the rules of the society were such as were usually adopted by friendly societies, yet others were such as regulated the action of trades unions, and were calculated to act as a restraint upon trade. The judgment of the Lord Chief Justice has put before us very plainly this question as to the legality of the Act, and of its illegality at the same time as regards any action in the civil courts—

“He quite agreed with Mr. Mellish that if the main object of the society was that of benevolence, though the rules might have gone a little further or a little less, that it was one coming within the 9th section of the Act; but here the very purpose and existence of the society was not merely that of carrying out those objects for which benevolent societies, so-called, were established; but also for the purpose of carrying out a trades union, under a very generally understood combination by which men bound themselves not to work except under certain conditions, and to support themselves when out of employment in conformity with the interests and wishes of the body at large. He was far from saying that a trades union so constituted, and for such a purpose, would bring the members within the criminal law. On the same principle that a combination of masters for a certain purpose was so far illegal in respect of civil rights that it could not be enforced, so he thought that a civil action brought on these rules would be held to be illegal. He thought, for two reasons, that this society could not be brought within the provisions of the Friendly Societies’ Act—first, because the purposes for which trades unions were organized were not analogous to those of benefit societies; and secondly, because this arrangement, though not criminal, yet, being in restraint of trade, they were by the law of the land illegal.”

Now that state of the law is certainly not satisfactory. It ought to be more clearly defined what are the rules which make it illegal for any combination of persons to take place; because unless it is, the right which they have of enforcing from those who have their money any civil right is very questionable. It ought also to be so defined, that the members of these societies may not under cover of a benevolent purpose attempt to do something that is contrary to law or in restraint of trade. The question then arises whether the rules of these societies cannot be so regulated by law as to draw the line between that which is legal and that which is illegal; so that in the one case persons may know that if legal their rights will be secured, and that if illegal they ought not to attempt to enter into such societies. In saying this I do not wish to give an opinion as to what should ultimately be the law of the land, because that must depend upon the result of the inquiry about to be instituted. On the one hand, when you find these societies extending, and increasing in magnitude, and consider that they were originally established to give themselves perfect freedom with regard to their own labour, it is impossible to ignore their existence or to deny their claims. On the other hand, if they attempt to obtain through the instrumentality of these combinations something which the law does not allow, and cannot allow, then the line ought so to be drawn that they ought not to be permitted to claim a right which is not given to them. But it appears to me that, do what you will—even if you can distinguish, which I believe you may, between what will give these societies a legal existence and that which ought to be restrained if beyond the law—yet one of the greatest evils of all—that of locks-out on the one hand and strikes on the other—will not be lessened until you can find something by which the differences between the employers of labour and the employed can be satisfactorily settled. I consider that one of the most important, if not the most important, objects of inquiry will be, whether arbitration or conciliation courts, as they are called, or some other tribunal may not be established, in which both parties would have equal confidence, for the purpose of adjusting their differences before they arrive at that point which is fatal, not only to themselves, but to the best interests of the country. It will be necessary therefore that the Commission, if appointed, shall have some person of great judicial eminence to direct the inquiry, so as to leave the law no longer in its present uncertain and unsatisfactory state, and to suggest for the mutual satisfaction of both employer and employed some tribunal by means of which their differences may be adjusted. I believe that no legislation whatever can be more important than that which would accomplish this great and most desirable object. I said before, that it was not merely on the ground of the uncertainty, and therefore, to some extent, the unsatisfactory state of the law, that I thought the time had come when this inquiry should be made. I said also that the subject was imperfectly understood, and, from all I can hear, both on the part of the masters and of the men, they do not seem to have been brought into such a position that the views of each could be thoroughly understood by the other. Although both have given much consideration to the subject from their own point of view, the different opinions entertained respecting it have never hitherto been brought before one tribunal where they can be compared and sifted, and where each party may understand the views of the other. If this inquiry attains that object, we shall then have before us, for the purpose of legislation, a full and complete exposition of the views and opinions on both sides, in order that we may then settle the law upon a satisfactory basis. The people of Sheffield, workmen as well as masters, having solicited inquiry in order to detect the atrocious crime lately committed there, I venture to think that the opportunity may well be taken, and ought to be taken, to consider the whole subject, in order that Parliament may afterwards apply the best remedy which can be devised. It was said on the first night of the Session by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), alluding to the paragraph in the Queen's Speech upon this subject, that he hoped those who recommended the Commission did not mean to interfere with the perfect freedom either of capital or of labour, so long as nothing was done, by means of these unions and associations, to injure the freedom of trade. I hope that the few words I have spoken to-night will show that no such intention is entertained by the Government. What they desire through the Commission, and the powers which they will ask Parliament to confer on the Commission, is, to draw the line which ought to be drawn between perfect freedom of labour as well as capital, and those illegal acts and acts of violence, threat, and intimidation, which are as detrimental to workmen as they are to masters and to the country at large. If I wanted one proof to show that this is the sole desire of the Government, I believe I should have nothing further to do than to read the words of the Commission. Her Majesty has directed the Commission to inquire and report on the organization and rules of trades unions and other associations, whether of workmen or employers, and to inquire into and report on the effect produced by such trades unions and associations upon workmen and employers respectively, and on the relations between workmen and employers, and on the trade and industry of the country, regard being had to the investigation of any recent acts of violence alleged to be promoted, encouraged, or connived at by such associations in Sheffield, with power to suggest any improvements in the law with respect to the matters aforesaid, or with respect to the relations between workmen and employers. The Commission will thus have to consider these great subjects—namely, the effect of these unions upon workmen and employers, and their relations, and the effect they now have or are likely to have upon the general trade of the country, with full power to report upon the whole matter for the mutual benefit of employers and employed. One word with regard to the Bill proposed. The Bill recites the Commission and the object of it, and then asks for power to inquire into the acts which have been perpetrated at Sheffield. It is confined to the investigation of the acts at Sheffield almost exclusively; because a roving inquiry of that kind is not an inquiry which Parliament would be likely to grant, nor would it in all probability lead to any practical result. There is, however, this power reserved, that in case application should be made to the Commissioners, and they should think it reasonable to extend the inquiry from Sheffield, then, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, a further investigation may be made. Powers are given by the Bill to compel the attendance of witnesses; and there is a power of examining witnesses on oath, and a further power of indemnifying them from the penalties which might otherwise attach to illegal acts which they had committed, on condition that they make a full and complete confession. These are the powers given by the Bill, and by these I hope that those acts which are done with so much secrecy, and which are attended by so much difficulty of discovery, may be put an end to, that the innocent may not be confounded with the guilty while the guilty may not be punished—that is not the object of the Bill—but be exposed, and a repetition of such acts be prevented. With regard to the Commission itself, it is proposed to make it as little of a partisan character as possible, and to attain that object, the names of those to sit upon it have been selected, one from the upper House of Parliament, four from this House, and four or five others from gentlemen outside the walls of Parliament who take a great interest in the subject, but who are not intimately connected with either the masters or the workmen. The President of the Commission is the late Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir William Erle, one I need not say, whose probity of character, judicial impartiality, and great ability, eminently fit him for the post. His life for a long series of years has been devoted to the benefit of his country, and he has secured for himself the universal esteem and respect of all parties. Lord Lichfield will be appointed from the other House. There is one whom I am sure the workmen, and the country generally, would have been glad to see appointed on this Commission—I refer to the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill); but he has declined to sit, on the ground that his duties in this House occupy too much of his time. I still hope that he may be induced to re-consider his decision. Then there is the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), who has taken a deep interest in the subject; the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. T. Hughes), Lord Elnho, and Sir Daniel Gooch. From outside the House the names of the following gentlemen have been added: Sir Edmund Head, Sir James Booth, and Mr. Herman Merivale. That makes nine members; but I ought to inform the House that I had a communication from a body of working men, urging that some working men should be put upon the Commission—or, if that course were not followed, that one or two persons, in whom the working men had entire confidence, might be appointed. My answer to them was, that I had endeavoured to avoid having a Commission with anything like a partisan spirit, and that if working men were added to it, masters must be added also. I, however, suggested that if it were satisfactory to them, they might recommend to me the name of some gentleman whom they would like to see upon the Commission, and the masters might do the same. In that way the names of Mr. William Matthews and Mr. F. Harrison were added to the number. I thank the House for the attention they have paid to me. I trust that good results will arise from the labours of the Commission. I hope its inquiries will tend to the mutual benefit of the employer and employed. Seeing that both masters and men agree in desiring an inquiry, and feeling perfect confidence that the inquiry will be properly conducted, I hope it will lead to results that will prove of permanent good to the country. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, no one could doubt the importance of the subject; but with regard to the Bill itself, he did not quite understand whether the compulsory powers to be granted were to be limited to Sheffield or to extend over the whole of the country, or whether the powers of the special inquiry at Sheffield would compel witnesses to give evidence which might tend to criminate themselves, and subject them to severe penalties. He would reserve any opinion upon the Bill, however, for the present. With regard to the construction of the Commission, he would only say that he did not think that a better President could have been selected than the eminent Judge—Sir William Erle—who had presided so long over the Court of Common Pleas. He felt sure that the Commission would be conducted in the spirit which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) desired. Of the other Members he would refrain from expressing any opinion. The composition of the Commission was a most important question; because, unless constituted in such a way as to give confidence to those whose interests were concerned, it would be found to produce very little benefit.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES said, he felt the immense gravity of the inquiry on which they were about to embark, and was delighted to hear that the composition of the Commission had been to some extent enlarged, so as to introduce one member at least who would be able conscientiously to advocate and to explain the position held by the trades unions as militant bodies. There was one point which it was desirable to impress upon Her Majesty's Government. This inquiry must extend over a considerable time; and meanwhile, a recent decision had placed the trades unions outside the pale of the law. From the year 1824, when the combination laws were repealed, up to 1854, the position of those societies was simply outside the law. Their objects were not illegal; but, at the same time, they had no corporate powers of suing or being sued, and were not in any shape within the protection of the civil law. In 1853 and 1854 Mr. Sotheron Estcourt was introducing his amendment of the Friendly Societies' Acts, and he (Mr. T. Hughes) rendered the trades unions such help as he could to bring them into a recognised position in the eye of the law. They sent deputations to Mr. Sotheron Estcourt on the subject, and the result was that he introduced into the Friendly Societies' Act of 1855 the 44th and other clauses, which enabled trades societies, by depositing their rules with the Registrar of Friendly Societies, to come within the scope of the Act as far as regarded summary powers of dealing with fraudulent officers and members of their own society with whom there might be any dispute. For several years after no further step towards recognition was taken. But in the year when the Post Office Savings Bank Act was passed, the societies came forward and asked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) to admit them to the same privilege as the Friendly Societies of investing their surplus funds in the bank. The right hon. Gentleman, with true statesmanship, granted them the privilege, so that they were then recognised for purposes of suing and being sued, and of investing their funds in Government securities. Then came the unfortunate decision of the Queen's Bench the other day, which entirely swept away all this recognition, and placed them absolutely outside the law of the country. Persons who knew much of the action of these bodies knew that a large portion of their action was that of provident societies, rather than of trades unions. They distributed thousands a week for purely benevolent purposes within the Friendly Societies Act. To his own knowledge that was the case with respect to one of these societies. Many of them had branches all over the country, and the treasurers of those branches were nominally members of the societies, but were generally publicans, in whose houses their meetings were held. The decision of the other day enabled dishonest persons to retain the funds of the societies, there being no legal process which would reach them. Therefore, rejoicing that this inquiry would be entered into, and hoping it would place the law on a much better footing, he would urge earnestly upon the Government the propriety of bringing forward some such measure as had been indicated by the hon.

Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), so as to provide that, pending the result of the investigation, dishonest persons should not be enabled, by the late decision of the Queen's Bench, to retain money intrusted to them, while the societies had no remedy. As this inquiry could only be of service in the event of thorough confidence being felt by both sides, it was of the first importance that the House should take such steps as would restore that confidence by enabling the trades unions to deal with their own funds and to punish any who, in consequence of the decision, might abuse their trust. By adopting such a course Parliament would convince the working men that they were resolved to act throughout the inquiry in perfect good faith, and thus the labours of the Commission would be likely to result in a termination satisfactory to all parties.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) as to the desirability of the proposed inquiry, but did not approve mixing up together two questions apparently akin, but in reality of a totally different nature. It was proposed that the Commission should inquire, in the first place, into the unfortunate outrages which had taken place at Sheffield, and then into the general effect which trades unions had upon the trade and industry of the country. These were both very proper subjects of inquiry; but the question was, whether it was quite expedient and quite just to refer them to the same Commission? Was it right to mix up a broad question of political economy with an investigation into certain local outrages? Was it right that a Commission appointed to inquire into one of the most serious questions of the day, affecting, as it did, the trade and manufactures of the country, should sit at Sheffield? He scarcely understood whether the compulsory powers asked for by the Bill to be vested in the Commission were to be limited to the Sheffield inquiry, or were to be exercised with regard to the broader question, which he understood was to be entered on at the conclusion of the other.

MR. WALPOLE said, he had not, perhaps, made himself clearly understood upon the point. The Commissioners were to have power to appoint examiners, who were to go down to Sheffield, under the direction of the President of the Commission, for the purpose of inquiring into the outrages which had taken place in that town. If an application were made to the Commissioners for inquiry elsewhere, and the Commissioners should think it reasonable so to extend the inquiry, then, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, a further investigation might be made.

MR. GOSCHEN said, these questions would be better gone into on the second reading; but he desired to know whether the Commissioners would be able to compel witnesses to attend upon any other questions except those connected with these outrages?

MR. WALPOLE said, they would not.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman negative such a supposition; as, in the first instance, there had been some fear entertained that the Commissioners would have power to compel the attendance of witnesses generally and examine them on oath, with regard to the great question as to how far the operation of these associations had been beneficial or otherwise to the manufacturing and other interests of the country. It would certainly have been a strong measure to call upon the secretary of a trades union to detail compulsorily, and on oath, the whole of the private affairs of the association with which he was connected. He must repeat his objection to the two subjects—the outrages at Sheffield, and the effect of the trades unions on the interests of the country—being treated together, as such a course was likely more or less to bias the minds of the Commissioners, by bringing before them prominently and from the very first, certain deplorable acts of a criminal nature in such a manner as to lead them to conduct the inquiry on the basis that the trades unions were connected with the outrages, and thereby more or less prejudice the examination into the broad question of the effect of these organizations on the trade of the country.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the difficulty to which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) alluded did not exist. When Mr. Hume brought in his Bill to give freedom to workmen to sell their labour at the best price they could get for it, there had been stringent laws preventing them from doing so, and there was great doubt expressed when Mr. Hume's Bill was proposed whether it would not be injurious to the industry of the country. Since then certain acts had occurred which the masters said verified their anticipations of mischief, and that this Sheffield case was an instance. The people of Sheffield said they had done no harm, and would prove their innocence. The question arose whether the laws at present existing were beneficial, and he could not see what mischief could arise from an inquiry into the Sheffield outrage, which had been brought forward as an illustration of the working of those laws? One party said the disease was fatal; another said it did not exist. An impartial inquiry would elicit the facts.

MR. NEATE said, he thought the two subjects of inquiry should be conducted separately. Even supposing that the investigation of the outrages at Sheffield would not prejudice the minds of the Commissioners against the trades unions, the House must look to the effect which would be produced upon the minds of the working men by the two questions being treated as one. The minds of the working classes were just now in a very sensitive state; and he did not think that it would be desirable to suggest to them, even indirectly, that the organization of the trades unions was in any degree connected with the crimes which had been perpetrated at Sheffield. He would have confidence in any Commission that might be appointed to inquire into the case. That, however, might not be the opinion of the working men of England, more especially as this Commission not only inquired into the facts, but also acted as the adviser of the Crown. It was therefore important not to do anything which would wound the sensibilities of the working men by mixing up two subjects not necessarily connected. He entirely agreed with the opinion expressed by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. T. Hughes) as to the propriety of restoring the trades unions to the position they had occupied before the late decision in the Court of Queen's Bench, which appeared to him to be in direct opposition to the expressed intentions of Parliament on the subject. It was a delicate matter to criticize the opinions of men so much above suspicion; but when Judges multiplied cases in which contracts were to be set aside as violations of public policy, they were not encroaching but treading upon ground which Parliament shared with them, and the recent decision was a very serious one, depriving these unions, as it did, of any legal status as benefit societies. Moreover, the discretion which was to be left to magistrates as to what degree of departure from the purposes of a friendly society rendered organizations illegal, was one which they were by no means fitted to exercise. Upon this ground alone it was desirable to pass a provisional measure exempting trade societies from the forfeiture of those privileges which they had enjoyed prior to the recent judgment; and he should defer proceeding with his Motion on that subject, in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would see the propriety of his proposal.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, that as a manufacturer, he had had a great deal to do with the employment of labour; and, as far as he could judge, the law as it stood enabled both the workman to sell his labour at the best price he could obtain for it, and the manufacturer to buy labour at the cheapest, without molestation. The establishment with which he was connected engaged a short time ago to build a warehouse; but the master mason found great difficulty with his men, who, notwithstanding that he increased their wages and shortened their hours of labour, all struck at an hour's notice. He said, that were he to submit to their demands he should soon have a repetition of the misconduct. The firm offered the master every assistance in their power; and after the landlord of a beer-shop, who had been found intimidating new men who sought for employment, had been summoned before a magistrate and sent for a term to Wakefield House of Correction without the option of a fine, and had his "topping" cut off—much to his astonishment—there was no further difficulty, and the work proceeded. There was a good deal of unreasonable feeling abroad that it was wrong for working men to stand to sell their labour at the best price; but it must be remembered that their labour was the only thing they had to sell, and the best thing to do was to leave these matters to take their natural course. Although his firm employed about 5,000 people, they had not had a strike for twenty-five years. It was a great mistake on the part of employers to suppose that the lowest priced labour was always the cheapest. If a man wanted to succeed in life, it was not by paying a less price for labour than his neighbours; because by paying a little more than others he would secure the best workmen in the district, and by having the best workmen he would be much better able to compete in the market than those who paid a smaller rate. As when they went to sell goods, so when they went to buy labour they must meet argument by argument, and in his opinion in the trades differences that had occurred the fault was quite as much with the masters as with the men. If there was not so much desire to run down the price of labour, and masters showed a more conciliatory spirit, there would be fewer strikes and outrages. If the law was imperfect, by all means let it be remedied. He thought it was not far from what it should be. They must not expect too much of Parliament. Anything practical that was to be accomplished must be brought about by the wise discretion of the masters and workmen in their dealings between themselves. If masters would try to get the best productions instead of the cheapest there would be fewer strikes.

MR. AYRTON said, he had been so often appealed to by friends of trade societies in reference to proceedings in that House, that he felt called upon to say a word upon the subject under discussion. No one could object to an inquiry into what had taken place at Sheffield; but the proceeding recommended by the Home Secretary was one which would be received with astonishment by the great body of the working people of the country. If he understood rightly, the Commission was to be appointed to inquire into the effect upon the industry of the country of trade societies legally and properly conducted. Parliament had long since recognised the legality and policy of trade societies. [Mr. WALPOLE dissented.] When Mr. Hume's Act passed, Parliament certainly recognised their legality. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Rolt) shook his head, and seemed to think that legal trade societies did not exist, but Parliament had certainly recognised the status of societies having legal objects in view. He entirely objected to the proposal of the Government that any Chief Justice, however learned, should sit in judgment on one of the gravest political questions of the day, and undertake to decide whether institutions which had long existed under the sanction of Parliament were or were not legal, and whether they conduced to the prosperity of the trade of the country. The inquiry would obviously be useless, unless if the Chief Justice's judgment were against trade societies they were to be repressed, and to return to the state of the law previous to 1824. It could have no other effect than to destroy any remaining feeling of confidence in the minds of the working classes with reference to the conduct of Parliament. It was quite another thing to inquire whether any abuse, any illegal acts, had been perpetrated under the name of trades societies. Nobody could better inquire into that subject than the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman did not contemplate going beyond that. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested courts of conciliation or arbitration—was the Commission to investigate that subject? Some four years ago he had devoted to it much time in a Committee upstairs; a Bill had been carefully framed for the establishment of these courts, and it passed that House without opposition. It had been rejected, however, by the other House in the most contemptuous manner, without consideration, without reflection, and, he ventured to add, without intelligence. The House of Lords, therefore, were answerable for the present state of things, and any acerbity of feeling which might exist between employers and workmen. It was not necessary to have a Commission to re-consider that question. He hoped the labours of the Commission would be limited to the investigation of the illegal acts of trades unions, and that it would not enter into an inquiry whether acts perfectly lawful have been favourable or unfavourable to the trade of the country. The decision of the Court of Queen's Bench that a particular rule was illegal might be right; but the effect of the decision in making the society itself illegal was unreasonable. The most convenient course would be for the right hon. Gentleman at once to bring in a Bill to declare that illegal rules in benefit societies should not be enforced, but that the other objects of such societies, which were most beneficial to the working people and advantageous to the country at large, should remain. It was monstrous that, because some illegal rule had crept in, therefore funds which had been subscribed to meet cases of sickness should be left at the mercy of any one to swallow up for his own benefit.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The hon. and learned Gentleman has founded his argument upon quite an imaginary opinion, which he has attributed to me. He seems to think that my opinion is that there is no such thing as a lawful trade society. I entirely disclaim entertaining such an opinion. I know that there are many legal trade societies. I entertain no doubt that the great majority of trade his own district, where efforts had been made to put an end to strikes, the most formidable difficulty which they had had to encounter were certain egregious fallacies which had been put forward under the authority of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill). For instance, he was quoted on one occasion as having stated, in one of his authoritative books, that it was quite justifiable for workmen not only to combine for a particular sort of work, and for a fixed rate of wages, irrespective of demand and supply; but that further than this, they were justified in adopting rules for the purpose of preventing too great a number of persons from entering into that trade and so establishing an injurious competition. When such arguments were put forward, he thought that it was quite necessary that there should be an inquiry in order to find an answer to such opinions. For his part, he believed that the inquiry would be of the greatest benefit.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) had somewhat mistaken the nature of this Bill. The object of the Bill was not simply to give Parliamentary powers to the Commission to detect the perpetrators of the outrages at Sheffield, but in the inquiry into trades unions and associations, they were to have regard to the outrages which were alleged to have been perpetrated by means of these trades unions and associations, and to see how far such outrages were or were not connected with the organization and rules of these trades unions and associations. It was therefore a part, and, indeed, a necessary part of the subject, according to all the regulations and to all the workings of these institutions, to see whether the unions had led to any great extent to acts of outrage and violence, such as had taken place. The hon. Gentleman would therefore see that if this Commission had been issued independently of a direction to inquire into the particular Sheffield outrage, still the Commission would not have done its duty if it had not inquired into the working of these unions in reference to all acts of aggression against workmen. It was therefore a necessary part of the inquiry; and that it should be carried on by a Commission having Parliamentary powers would only have this effect, that they could more thoroughly investigate the subject, and thereby enable Parliament to deal more satisfactorily with it. The hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) enlarged upon the importance—in which he fully agreed with him—of having tribunals established for the purpose of adjusting the differences between workmen and their employers. The hon. Gentleman totally misapprehended him if he thought for a moment that he (Mr. Walpole) was not of opinion that the hon. Member took great pains to establish such tribunals. He was perfectly aware that this was so. So long ago as Mr. Hume's Committee, there was a recommendation that there should be means found for settling such disputes. They did not attempt to define the means, but very few attempts in that direction had been made in Parliament until lately. Although the hon. Member's Bill had failed in the House of Lords, yet it was, perhaps, in consequence of this that a noble and learned Lord had now taken up the subject. The failure of that Bill was no reason for issuing the Commission; but still, if there were to be a Commission, surely the investigation should be completed, and should include this branch of the subject. He believed that there was no part of the matter more important than that there should be tribunals in which both masters and men should have confidence; and he believed that they would be better constituted for having the opinions of masters and men directly brought before the Commission, which should, as it were, set its seal on that which would be the best mode of securing the desired end. The hon. Member (Mr. Neate) would find that it was not so easy a matter to alter the law in the point he alluded to. The real fact was that the whole question of the legality of these unions, with reference to questions like that that had recently arisen in the Queen's Bench, turned upon this, what were to be the rules which were to sanction the status of such unions, so that they might be able to enforce their civil rights against members of their own body, and also against strangers, without trespassing upon the laws of the land in those respects in which laws were deemed necessary for the freedom of trade, or for other purposes, which, if they were not observed, would enable such societies to commit acts which they were now not permitted to do. It was the rules of these societies upon which the difficulties arose. There was no difficulty if the societies were simply for friendly or benevolent purposes, legalized by the Act of George IV, apart from combining for the settlement of wages to be worked for and the hours of work ; but if they went beyond into matters which the law did not recognise as legal, then there was established a state of things that might or might not be good, according to the rules for the organisation of these societies. Although they could insist upon all their civil rights whilst they kept within certain bounds, yet beyond them they could not go until the Legislature had determined that what was now contrary to law should no longer be so. The hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) said that this Commission would be taken in a spirit (which was certainly not intended) of an inquiry hostile to working men ; but all he (Mr. Walpole) could say was, that he had at that time several applications from working men asking for inquiry. And, in conclusion, he would express his own belief that this inquiry would do a great deal of good, and be beneficial to all concerned in trade, as well as to the country in general.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for facilitating in certain cases the proceedings of the Commissioners appointed to make inquiry respecting Trades Unions and other associations of employers or workmen, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE.

CRIMINAL LAW BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to remove some defects in the administration of the Criminal Law, said, the measure was not one of an extensive nature, and was entirely directed to the removal of evils which had come under his own observation in the Central Criminal Court, in which he had the honour to preside. The House was aware that at present ample means were taken to secure the attendance and provide for the remuneration of witnesses whose evidence was necessary to establish the guilt of the prisoner. He proposed by the Bill to extend that power, so that it should not be confined to the witnesses who were required to establish the prisoner's guilt, but should also apply to witnesses who might establish his innocence. That was a matter of great importance to the due administration of justice. When prisoners made statements in their own defence, he had not unfrequently felt ashamed in asking them whether they had any witnesses to call, knowing, as he did, that they had no pecuniary means of compelling the attendance of witnesses who might or might not prove their innocence. It was, of course, necessary to provide safeguards against the abuse of this privilege, the nature and merits of which would be best considered in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was requested by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, who was then absent, to say that any measure on such a subject introduced by the learned Recorder was entitled to great attention and respect. That point of the proposed Bill which provided for the attendance of witnesses on behalf of the accused was entitled to favourable consideration, although the power might be much abused unless carefully guarded. He, of course, offered no opposition to the introduction of the measure ; but it must be understood that the Government would reserve to itself the right to form an opinion on the Bill and its details, unless it was laid before the House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to remove some defects in the administration of the Criminal Law, ordered to be brought in by Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY and Mr. COLERIDGE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 8.]

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that his Warrant for the appointment of Members to serve on the General Committee of Elections was upon the Table :—Warrant read as followeth :—

Pursuant to the provisions of "The Election Petitions Act, 1848," I do hereby appoint Samuel Whitbread, esquire, Member for the Borough of Bedford ; James Clay, esquire, Member for the Town of Kingston upon Hull ; The honourable Edward Frederic Leveson Gower, Member for the Borough of Bodmin ; Sir Frederick William Heygate, baronet, Member for the County of Londonderry ; George Slater-Booth, esquire, Member for the Northern Division of the County of Southampton ; and Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, baronet, Member for the County of Perth ; to be Members of the General Committee of Elections for the present Session. Given under my hand this eighth day of February, 1867.

JOHN EVELYN DENISON, Speaker.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY PROFESSORSHIPS BILL.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to open the Professorships of Anatomy and Chirurgery, Chemistry and Botany, in the University of Dublin, to all persons, irrespective of their religious creed.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. LAWSON and Mr. SULLIVAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 10.]

MINES.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, February 11, 1867.

LAND TENURE (IRELAND).

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, notice had been given in the other House that Bills relating to the improvement of the tenure of land in Ireland would be shortly introduced. He was afraid that those Bills would not deal with the whole of the question, but only with a part of it; and as his wish was that the question should be very fully discussed when it came on in that House, he would, on Monday next, call the attention of their Lordships to the subject, and lay upon the table a Bill which was nearly the same as the one he introduced last year.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN, in moving for Returns respecting the Established Church (Ireland), said, he did not intend to open up the great question of the Irish Church at present—a question which must some day receive solution at the hands of Parliament—for the present, he would content himself with stating that the rulers of the Church were quite aware that there existed defects in relation to the Established Church in Ireland which required remedy, and anomalies in its constitution, and in the distribution of its endowment, which required to be carefully considered and amended. No matter what the protestations of attachment to the Church might be, or however high the office he might hold in it, he could not look upon any one as a safe friend or a wise counsellor, who justified the one or palliated the other. As this question must sooner or later come before the Legislature, it was just, reasonable, and right that he should seek to place in their Lordships' hands reliable Returns, so that when the question came on to be discussed, their Lordships might be able to give their best attention to it. The enemies of the Church in Ireland sought its fall and destruction; but if the rulers of the Church would bring in a well-considered and wise measure of reform in the Church, their enemies' wild cry for destruction would awaken no response in the hearts of the people of Ireland, and would have no weight with thoughtful men. He would just add that he believed the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland disposed of the funds in their hands with great judgment and prudence.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

Return from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (Ireland) of the Gross and Net Revenues of the Established Church in Ireland; specifying the various Heads from which such Revenues are derived, and including the Revenues of the Church now in the Hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners derived from Ecclesiastical Sources; Also,

Statement of the Charges and Deductions which constitute the Difference between Gross and Net Revenues: Also,

The Total Amount received by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the Purchase of Perpetuities: Also,

The present Amount invested: Also,

Payments to Vicars Choral and Curates of suspended Benefices; specifying to what Cathedral such Vicars Choral are attached, and the Names of the suspended Benefices, and Amount paid in each Case: Also,

Payments in Augmentation of small Benefices from the Funds belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with the Name of each Benefice and the Amount of Augmentation: Also,

The Annual Amount paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the Payment of Parish Clerks Salaries: And also,

The Annual Amount paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to provide Communion Elements.—(The Bishop of Down.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN said, he was not able to support the Motion of the right rev. Prelate; but that was not from any desire not to see all anomalies in the Irish Church removed, but simply upon the ground that these Returns would involve a vast deal of labour to a large body of persons, and that even if they were made they would be superfluous, as the information sought for was already in their Lordships' hands. Most of it was to be obtained from the Annual Report furnished by the Commissioners; some of the facts were to be found in an Act of William IV.; and Returns made on the Motion of Captain Staecpoole in 1864 gave other portions of the information now asked for. Under these circumstances, he would request the right rev. Prelate to withdraw his Motion, or if he did not do so he should ask their Lordships to negative it.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN wished to state that the most rev. Prelate was in error in stating that the Returns sought for were easily accessible, for the fact was they were spread over many years, and were set forth in different reports.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE thought the Motion ought to be acceded to. The only reason given why these Returns should not be given in the form set forth, was that they would cause extra labour to some persons, but that was in truth no reason at all. The Returns asked for ought to be presented to the House in a compendious form. He certainly could not understand how their preparation could cost much labour, for the right rev. Prelate who offered the objection stated in so doing that the greater part of the information sought already existed, though scattered in numerous miscellaneous papers. A right rev. Prelate had moved for these Returns, and it would seem strange to the public if they were refused at the instance of his most rev. Brother.

THE EARL OF DERBY was desirous that every necessary information should be furnished; but out of the eight queries presented by the right rev. Prelate, information had already been given in reply to seven; and a Motion for a Return was at present before the other House, which would be agreed to by the Government. That Return would furnish the necessary information asked for by the eighth query. It seemed to him to be imposing unnecessary expense and trouble to call a second time for information which had already been given in another form.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN was surprised at the Government conceding to a popular assembly a demand which was refused when made in the higher branch of the Legislature. The Motion, too, in the House of Commons, instead of referring to one point only, was of a most voluminous character.

LORD CRANWORTH suggested that the right rev. Prelate should assimilate the terms of his Motion as regarded the information not already granted, with those of the Motion to be made in the other House of Parliament and which was to be given to the Government.

THE EARL OF DERBY had not the slightest objection to concurring in the right rev. Prelate's Motion if he would make it more agreeable to that moved in the other House. What he objected to was the furnishing the same information in different forms, a practice which would entail a great deal of unnecessary work upon the office.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, during the recess, there has been issued from the Home Office any Circular addressed to the Trustees of those Turnpike Trusts which were scheduled for discontinuance in the Continuance Act of last Session; if so, what is the nature of that Circular, and do the Government contemplate legislation upon the subject of the turnpike system during the present Session? There was also a supplementary Question which he wished to ask—namely, Whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to re-introduce that compensation clause on the same subject which he had had the honour of inserting in the Continuance Bill of last Session, which the right hon. Gentleman omitted, but which being afterwards moved by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was unanimously adopted in that House, though it was rejected in another place? As he had not given notice of his intention to ask this Question, he would, of course, postpone it if necessary.

MR. WALPOLE: It will be in the recollection of the House that a vast number of turnpike trusts—many more than usual—were included in the Bill of last Session; and inasmuch as several persons were affected by that Act, they were promised at the time of the discussion that they should have an opportunity of stating their case before the Home Secretary. Accordingly, in the course of the autumn a circular was issued, inviting, in fact, any observations which they might have to make upon it. That is the answer which I have to make to the first part of the Question of my hon. Friend. With regard to the nature of the circular, I think I have explained that. As for the second part of his Question, as to intended legislation on the subject, I must frankly own that so great are the difficulties that I cannot at present promise legislation on the subject. As to the other Question of which my hon. Friend has not given notice, I would rather postpone my reply to it.

BUNHILL FIELDS BURIAL GROUND.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government are aware that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have received from the Corporation of the City of London an offer

"To undertake the charge of the Bunhill Fields burial ground as trustees for the public, defraying the cost of watching, maintaining, and keeping it in a proper condition, planting trees and shrubs, keeping up the gravel walks, and preserving the tombs, so that it may form, within proper hours, and under proper regulations, a decent and ornamental open space of the Metropolis, covenanting that, in the event of failure in these respects, it should revert to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners," and that such offer has been declined by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners?

MR. WALPOLE: There are some questions which it is hardly possible to answer with a single negative or affirmative, and this is one of them. I believe there was some such application made some time ago on the part of the City of London to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with the view of preserving the burial grounds as an ornamental open space; but, inasmuch as there are large claims made on the City of London with reference to that subject, and as a vast deal of negotiation has been going on with regard to it, I believe the best answer I can give to the Question is to inform the hon. Gentleman that an unopposed Motion will be made to-night for the production of all the Correspondence on this subject, which I believe will supply all the information which the hon. Gentleman desires to possess.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Returns of the "Number of Miles Travelled by Trains," printed on page 27 of Parliamentary Paper, No. 483, ordered to be printed 7th August, 1866, are made up by the several Companies referred to on one and the same principle?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was unable to state on what principle railway companies made up these returns. He believed that all the companies used the same form. And as they wished to know the number of miles proper travelled, exclusive of shunting and unprofitable travelling, he would next year alter the questions put to the railway companies, so as to meet the hon. Gentleman's wishes.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH THE EAST.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If any steps have been taken towards carrying into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session with reference to Postal Communication with the East?

MR. HUNT stated, that on the 1st of this month formal notice was given to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company to terminate their contract with regard to the India and China mails, so that Her Majesty's Government might be placed in a position to contract for the conveyance of mails once a week to Bombay. With regard to the contract for the conveyance of the Australian mails, Her Majesty's Government had thought it better to defer giving notice until after they had received from the colonies their replies to communications which have been addressed to them on the subject.

BARRICADE AROUND HYDE PARK. QUESTION.

MR. DYCE NICOL asked the First Commissioner of Works, When the present barricade around Hyde Park is likely to be removed; and what description of Fence is to be erected in place of it?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The Park Lane section of the fences is under contract to be completed by the 15th of October next. Other portions of the fences are contracted to be completed by the 15th of July next year. The character of the fence is a substantial one of iron, and I hope, to a certain extent, ornamental. It will be set in a granite curb.

PUBLIC RECORDS OF IRELAND. QUESTION.

SIR ROWLAND BLENNERHASSET asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government intend to take any steps to regulate the custody of the Records and Rolls of Ireland?

LORD NAAS: The attention of the Government has been directed to this question during the recess, and I hope to be able in the course of a very few days to submit a measure on the subject to Parliament.

ARMY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN GRIDLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Army Estimates will be laid upon the table of the House; and, whether they will be considered before the Navy Estimates?

GENERAL PEEL: The Army Estimates will be laid upon the table of the House on Monday next, and I shall bring them forward at the earliest possible period, of which I will give due notice. At present, I am unable to say whether they will precede the Navy Estimates.

FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for the more effectual discovery and punishment of persons using false weights and measures, in order that a practice disgraceful to the trading community, and especially prejudicial to the interests of the poorer classes may be put a stop to?

MR. WALPOLE: I have to inform my noble Friend that it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure on the subject.

JAMAICA—GENERAL O'CONNOR. QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Return ordered in August last referring to the Correspondence of the Horse Guards with General O'Connor will be laid upon the table?

GENERAL PEEL: In answer to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that I have already laid the papers on the table of the House.

INSURRECTION IN CRETE.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, How soon the Papers will be laid upon the table with reference to the Cretan Insurrection?

LORD STANLEY: I laid them on the table ten minutes ago.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE.

Order for Consideration of so much of Her Majesty's most gracious Speech as relates to the Representation of the People in Parliament read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I move that the paragraph of THE QUEEN'S SPEECH that relates to the Representation of the People in Parliament may be read at the table.

Paragraph in Queen's Speech at the opening of the Session read, as follows:—

"Your Attention will again be called to the State of the Representation of the People in Parliament; and I trust that your Deliberations, conducted in a Spirit of Moderation and mutual Forbearance, may lead to the Adoption of Measures which, without unduly disturbing the Balance of political Power, shall freely extend the Elective Franchise."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish, Sir, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, clearly to convey to the House the interpretation which they put upon those gracious words that have just been read, and which, under their advice, Her Majesty deigned to address to her Parliament. They are significant words. Her Majesty from the Throne appeals to the House of Commons, in deliberating on the most important question of politics—namely, the distribution of power in a State—that they should divest themselves of that party spirit which, generally speaking, is the legitimate and efficient, the customary and constitutional, influence by which all great public questions in this day are brought to a satisfactory settlement. Sir, Her Majesty's Ministers are the last men in this House who would depreciate the importance of party; they are the last men who would wish to derogate from its legitimate function. In their opinion party organization is the condition of Parliamentary government, and without it they see no security for either efficiency or independence in a popular assembly. Nor, least of all, Sir, on this occasion are they inclined in any way to refrain from appealing to the support of those with whom, for long years of public alliance and private friendship, they have been connected in this House. On the contrary, they feel—painfully and profoundly feel—that this is the occasion of all others when they would have most earnestly to appeal for a continuance of that support, of that confidence, of that sympathy, of that friendship, and even of that forbearance on which they before rested with assurance.

Sir, the meaning that they attribute to those words is that, under the circumstances in which the House finds itself, it was in our opinion expedient that Parliamentary Reform should no longer be a question which should decide the fate of Ministries. Sir, we have arrived at that conclusion with the conviction that it is one consistent with our duty and our honour as public men, and we hope that the House of Commons, notwithstanding that expression of opinion from a very limited quarter, after due consideration, will also be of opinion that such a course is compatible on their part with all those principles and all those sentiments that ought to influence public men. And, Sir, we have arrived at that conclusion, that it is not for the advantage of the country that Parliamentary Reform should be a question that should decide the fate of a Ministry, that it should not be what is commonly called a party question, for this simple but to us irresistible reason, that all parties in the State have attempted to deal with it, and all parties in the State have failed. In 1852 there was a pure Whig Government, headed by Lord John Russell, which dealt with this subject and failed. In the year 1854 there was a Coalition Government, headed by the Earl of Aberdeen, which attempted to deal with this question and failed. In the year 1859 there was a Conservative Government, headed by the Earl of Derby, which attempted to deal with this question and failed. In the year 1860 there was a moderate Liberal Government, headed by Lord Palmerston, which attempted to deal with this question, and failed. In the year 1866 there was a Government which I will not, notwithstanding the present rage for analysis, describe as an immoderate Liberal Government—headed again by Earl Russell—which attempted to deal with this question and failed.

There may be some who will urge these circumstances as arguments to show that the question is one which ought not to have been dealt with, that there was no necessity whatever to draw the attention of Parliament to its consideration. Sir, all that I have to say on the part of my Colleagues is that this is not the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the seeds for, perhaps, the most considerable portion of those changes that we contemplate, were sown in the memorable Act of 1832. Until the Act of 1832 was passed the claims of the labouring classes to a share in our Parliamentary system were acknowledged, and their rights were enjoyed and practised. Although the mode by which they were asserted may not have been happily adapted to the circumstances of the present century, there can be no doubt that those claims were definitely acknowledged and acted upon. Before the Act of 1832, for example, it was possible for the labouring classes to return both Members for Preston, a town of now nearly 100,000 inhabitants; they might also have returned two for the city of Coventry, then, as now, the seat of an important and ingenious branch of our manufactures; and there were a great many places in England in which they exercised a considerable, if not a preponderating, influence. But it was thought fit at that time to abolish those rights and privileges. I think myself—I thought so then—that was a great error. It is fair to admit that, as they were then enjoyed and practised, those rights were, perhaps, ill adapted to our present social state; and though the labouring classes, in the most considerable seats of labour, might under the old machinery not have been represented, that was not a reason for abolishing the rights, but rather for remodelling them, and adapting them to the new circumstances with which statesmen then had to deal. Nor, Sir, did the abolition of those rights pass unregarded in this House. Those who were the framers of the Reform Bill, and who were supported with enthusiasm by powerful classes, were able then to override the objections from influential quarters. They were warned by some of the most eminent authorities of this House as to the danger and impolicy of the course they were pursuing. The memorable words of Sir Robert Peel on this subject are familiar to the House. He warned the Government of the day that in putting an end to the rights of freemen as they then existed, and terminating all those other means by which the householder in many boroughs registered his vote and exercised it, they were embarking in a course which eventually must involve them in great danger and inconvenience. The rights of those electors which were then attacked were not lost for want of advocacy—and advocacy of the highest and ablest character—in this House. One of the most shining lights of our time, Sir William Follet, brought those claims before the House on more than one occasion with that eloquence for which he was remarkable, and that power of argument for which he was distinguished. The rights of the existing generation were, in another place, not only vindicated, but saved by no less a person than Lord Lyndhurst.

Sir, I would not, especially after mentioning such names, refer to anything I have myself expressed. Under no circumstance, indeed, would I refer to anything I have said here, merely in vindication of myself or my own conduct. But if I have made a declaration upon a public question of importance as the organ of a party; if I have been requested by men of eminence to express an opinion upon some subject of public importance in this House, I think it is no assumption to refer to it, not as the expression of an individual, but, as in a certain sense historic, as illustrative of the conduct and opinion of a party. Now, Sir, in 1852, when I first had the honour of a seat on this Bench, the question of Parliamentary Reform was then ripe, though it was then urged in a very different spirit, and with very different objects from those which now animate its advocates. In about the first week—certainly within the first month—of our accession to Office, it was absolutely necessary that we should come to a conclusion respecting the policy we should pursue upon that subject. At that time what was called piecemeal Reform was very much in fashion; and I think it was upon one of the Motions of the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Locke King), which he brought forward immediately after the formation of the Government of 1852, that it became necessary for me to consult Lord Derby and the most eminent of his Colleagues as to the line we should pursue respecting Reform. Perhaps the House will allow me to quote one passage from what I said on that occasion. I objected to the Motion of the hon. Member for Surrey, my objection being a broad one—namely, that Parliamentary Reform was not a subject which ought to be treated in a piecemeal manner; and I said, with reference to this Motion, and with the full concurrence of Lord Derby and of my Colleagues—

“But I have also another objection to this Bill. I have often said to this House—I repeat it now, and it is the expression of a deep and sincere conviction on my part—that I think in the construction of that memorable law, the Reform Act of 1832, there was a very great deficiency, which consisted in a want of due consideration of the rights of the working classes to the franchise. . . . Under our old system, by the suffrages of the freemen, the political rights of the labourer were acknowledged by the Constitution. We virtually destroyed those rights. . . . I do not for a moment wish now to maintain that there were not strong reasons why the existing arrangements should be interfered with; but, then, I never heard a reason why a more satisfactory arrangement could not have been substituted in lieu of the old one. I trace much of the discontent in this country, which at times has been painfully felt, with regard to the Reform Act of 1832, to the omission to which I have adverted.”

That will at least show that the question was one which, having been taken up originally, when the Reform Act was introduced into this House, by a party in the State not then successful, has since never been entirely deserted by them. On every fitting occasion there have been expressions of opinion similar to those just quoted; but I have read this extract because the declaration which the House has now heard was made by me as a Minister, after duly consulting those with whom I have the honour to act. Measures of disfranchisement of this kind could not now be tolerated; but in 1832 it was not difficult to carry them with impunity. The position of the labouring classes in 1832 differed from their position in 1867; but such was the excitement produced by the measure of 1832 in the country generally, especially among those influential classes who considerably benefited by it, and whose power was immensely increased by it, that it was utterly impossible that any policy which was projected by the authors of the Bill of 1832 could have been successfully opposed either in this House or by those who, outside the House, were more immediately interested in the question. That, however, which Sir Robert Peel told the Government of Lord Grey inevitably happened. He urged, as time advances and the country prospers, you will find the labouring class whose Parliamentary rights you are now destroying will take the opportunity of claiming again the privileges which you have thoughtlessly taken from them, and for which you offer no substitute. Since 1832 this country has, no doubt, made great progress. But it is during the last ten years that progress has been most remarkable. I will not now attempt to inquire into the causes, the particular causes, which have brought about that great advance. But I think I may say there is one sovereign cause which is at the bottom of everything, and that is the increased application of science to social life. That I believe to be the main cause of the vast changes we have seen in the condition and feelings of classes. We are all familiar with the material results which that application of science has produced. They are prodigious; but, to my mind, the moral results are not less startling. The revolution in locomotion, which would strike us daily as a miracle if we were not familiar with it, has given the great body of the inhabitants of this country in some degree the enlightening advantages of travel. The mode in which steam-power is applied to the printing press in these days produces effects more startling than the first discovery of printing in the 15th century. It is science that has raised wages; it is science that has increased the desires and the opportunities of men; and it is science that has ennobled labour. There are some who say its effects must be to equalize the condition of men. That is a controversy. I am not anxious to-night on that or any other subject to enter into controversy; but this, I think, may be said—there is no doubt that the application of science to social life has elevated the condition of all classes.

Having said this in all sincerity, I must repudiate an opinion which is too prevalent, and, as I think, utterly unfounded—the opinion that, especially in this House, the legitimate claims of the labouring class to their due share in the Parliamentary system have met with vexatious opposition, and have encountered a sinister spirit of neglect and intentional delay. On the contrary, Sir, forming my opinion from what I have seen out of doors, and, I am sorry to add, in some measure within these walls, I should say that these claims have been treated rather with an Epicurean feeling, which, anxious not to be troubled by the settlement of a disagreeable and, perhaps, as some think, a dangerous question, would agree to anything for immediate ease without any thought of our duty towards those who may follow us. All I can say of such a feeling is that I think it more dangerous than any of those opinions which perhaps to-day may have alarmed the minds of some, and which, if practised, would injure the future of those who preach them. I have no hesitation in saying that as far as I can form an opinion, and I am sure on this head it is an impartial one, I know of no great question—no question, I mean, that largely influences the history of this country, and touches the principles upon which our Constitution rests—which has met with less discussion and with less difficulty than the one now engaging our attention.

It is sometimes said that Parliamentary Reform has been a Parliamentary question for fifteen years. It is very true that the attention of Parliament has been called to schemes for re-constructing this House; but I deny that these schemes were at all adapted to supply the deficiency which we are now considering, or were at all conceived in a spirit likely to bring about any satisfactory result. I look upon the Bill of 1852, introduced by Lord John Russell, as eminently a premature movement, for it did not even aim at supplying the deficiency to which I refer. I do not blame Earl Russell for bringing forward that Bill. I have vindicated him before in this House when attacked upon that head. I look upon the measure of 1852 as strictly a measure of self-defence. Lord John Russell, who understood the question of Parliamentary Reform, found himself night after night attacked, as it were, by Members of this House who proposed isolated measures applying only to some fragmentary portion of the great question of Reform. He knew the danger which might accrue if such isolated measures were adopted. He knew that, whether the result were democratic or oligarchic, consequences might ensue from such a course which would probably startle their proposers as much as anybody else. Therefore, Lord John Russell, after five years' campaigning against his Liberal friends, found it absolutely necessary to make some effort for a comprehensive settlement of the question of Parliamentary Reform. Hon. Gentlemen rose night after night bringing forward Motions about the borough, at another time about the county franchise, then proposals which would have completely revolutionized the whole system by which votes are given and recorded, and Lord John Russell eventually proposed a scheme to deal with these points. But I beg the House to remark that the disturbance of the settlement of 1832 did not originate with Lord John Russell. It originated entirely with the House of Commons. It was not Lord John Russell, or his rivals, or any body of public men, who, when they make proposals to this House, make them at least with a sense of responsibility, that they may be called on to carry them into action. That was not the case. It was the House of Commons, it was those whom we habitually describe as independent Members, who commenced the disturbance of the settlement of 1832.

And here I would ask the House to reflect on these two circumstances. The origin of Parliamentary Reform as a question in the House of Commons must be found in the conduct of individuals—of independent Members of this House. This, therefore, is a House of Commons question; it is not a party question. And it is remarkable that the House of Commons, having been the originators of the disturbance of the settlement of 1832, have defeated every attempt that has been made by organized parties, by responsible bodies of men, and by leaders of political connections, to effect a settlement of a question which was then unsettled. I am bringing no charge of misconduct against any Members of the House or against the House of Commons itself; I am speaking historically on the subject. The House of Commons may have been perfectly justified in what it did. I will not enter into any controversy to-night on the course which it pursued. The Members of the House may have been justified in coming forward and sedulously attempting to disturb the settlement of 1832. They may have been justified in defeating any measure which may have been brought forward by successive Ministers to settle the points in controversy. All that I do not deny; but I think all must admit that the House of Commons, with regard to this question of Parliamentary Reform, has incurred, as it were, certain peculiar responsibilities. They originated the question, and at the same time they have prevented it being settled.

Now, though few will doubt that, under these circumstances, the House of Commons itself, as independent of any particular party organization, has incurred a general responsibility with respect to this question, it can, I think, hardly be denied that with regard to the present subject the relations between this House and the Government are peculiarly difficult and perplexing; because it is to be observed that, although the House of Commons defeated all the five measures that were brought forward by Lord Russell, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston, and Lord Derby, they did in four of these instances permit the measure to be read a second time; but in the case of the Bill of Lord Derby's Government they thought fit—I am not going for a moment to question the propriety of their conduct—not to permit that measure to be read a second time. Now I say, without the slightest soreness on the subject, that it was the opposition of Lord John Russell in 1859 that made Parliamentary Reform a party question. Until the vote taken on that occasion it was not so. Well, no man is so sensible of the advantages of free discussion as myself. I am always ready to acknowledge its practical value. I must, therefore, repeat, and I am now going to prove, the statement that I made just now. I say that until 1859 Parliamentary Reform was not a Parliamentary question. When Sir Robert Peel, in 1834, was called upon to form a Government, there was then considerable odium raised against him owing to the insinuations of what were then called sincere Reformers—that on grounds of party policy he would disturb the Act of 1832. Sir Robert Peel found it impossible to make way against these unfounded aspersions unless he took steps which, from their grave and solemn character, would duly impress the public mind. It was in this House, when called upon to take the responsible position of First Minister, under circumstances of very great difficulty, that he made the solemn declaration, with the complete assent of all his party, that he would never seek to disturb the settlement of 1832. And that engagement was religiously observed. Although the settlement of 1832, with all its virtues, and I have never denied them, was no doubt conceived and carried with extreme party feeling, and in many of its minor provisions highly advantageous to the party that carried them—I do not blame them for that—I say, notwithstanding all that, the compact entered into by Sir Robert Peel and his party was religiously observed; and it was not until 1851 and 1852, when dark rumours were abroad as to the intentions of Lord John Russell, who, in a very solemn manner, in this House had pledged himself, on the faith of the Whigs, to the principle of finality, that the Conservative party had to consider what course to take if Lord John Russell should recede from that undertaking. I believe I may say that was a subject which was considered by the most eminent and leading men—many now departed or lost to us—men held in the highest honour for their integrity and public spirit, like the late Duke of Richmond, Lord George Bentinck, Mr. Bankes, and others who sat in this House—and many who still live and were in intimate communication with Lord Derby, and they came to the resolution that if Lord John Russell gave up the Act of 1832, nothing would induce them to take up a position of opposition to Parliamentary Reform. And their course has been consistent throughout. There never was a Bill brought forward on the subject of which the second reading was opposed by us.

I think I have traced the question now at least to the relinquishment of finality; and I think hon. Gentlemen will agree with me that there was no appearance of Reform being made a party question until that period. Many hon. Members who sat in the House at that time are familiar with what took place with regard to the subsequent Bills. Now, Sir, there is no man whose opinions on Parliamentary Reform are spoken of with more levity than Lord Palmerston. Some would conclude that Lord Palmerston was unquestionably very Conservative in his principles; that he was entirely opposed to any change in our Parliamentary Constitution; and that it was only for political convenience, and in order to make necessary arrangements for indispensable Colleagues, that he ever consented to the introduction of any measure of Reform. Now, there is not the slightest foundation for any such conclusion. In 1857 Lord Palmerston was at the culminating point of his power. He had then dissolved Parliament on the China vote, he had scattered all his enemies—even those who afterwards became his friends. The Opposition, with which I was connected, suffered, but probably less than most portions of the House, in that penal dissolution. Lord John Russell, a great authority in this question, only obtained the representation of the City of London as an act of courtesy, and the most powerful leaders now on the subject of Parliamentary Reform lost their seats in this House on that occasion. Lord Palmerston had, accordingly, an indisputable majority. He had none in his Cabinet at that moment—though all men whom he respected—in a position to dictate a policy to Lord Palmerston. The House met in the autumn of the same year; it was absolutely unnecessary for Lord Palmerston to introduce the question of Parliamentary Reform, and yet he recommended it in the Speech from the Throne. What happened in 1858? Lord Palmerston, who was supposed to be a Minister supported by the most powerful majority that ever appeared in Parliament, suddenly lost his pride of place, within twelve months of his triumphant dissolution; and when Lord Palmerston left office, he was so sensible that “some settlement”—as the fashionable phrase was then—was required, that he said if his successor, Lord Derby, would give his earnest attention to the subject, and could see his way to bringing forward a moderate and well-considered measure, Lord Derby might be certain it would receive from him a fair and candid consideration. Well, Sir, Lord Derby did not conceive that, if he brought forward such a measure, he could count upon any enthusiastic support from his opponents. All parties had not then tried their hand in vain; and no circumstances had then occurred which could justify a Minister in advising the Crown to appeal to Parliament to consider this question not as a party question. Lord Derby, however, did think that he was not putting too favourable an interpretation upon an undertaking that his efforts should receive a fair and candid consideration, when he concluded that if he did bring forward a measure, prepared with care and labour, it should at least be read a second time and receive a fair consideration from Parliament. But that did not prove to be the case. Notwithstanding this declaration of Lord Palmerston, and notwithstanding the efforts that Lord Palmerston made, the House of Commons set at defiance his authority, and a private Member brought forward an Amendment which gave a totally different colour to the conduct of the House. And who was that individual? Why, it was Lord John Russell. Lord John Russell then sat below the gangway; he was not a Member of the Government that had retired from Office; he was not then a proximate Minister. He occupied, indeed, a commanding position, such as a man of his achievements, high character, and talents always would command in this House; but he was then in the position of a private Member of Parliament. Well, the House of Commons followed Lord John Russell, so that it was again the House of Commons that came forward, and by that vote made it, I say, a party question. I do not object to the conduct of Lord John Russell. I am not contending about the decision which the House arrived at, as far as the decision itself was concerned, on the Bill of 1859; but this I do say, that it was a very great responsibility on the part of the House of Commons to throw out that Bill, and then, when they had forced a change of Ministry, to be unable to carry their opinions into effect.

Sir, I have thus shown that the position of the House of Commons, with regard to this question of Parliamentary Reform, is different from that which exists between the House generally and all other great questions, which are introduced and initiated in this House by a body of men who are in the possession of office, or who are candidates for office, and who therefore ought not to shrink from the responsibility of carrying their opinions into effect. I have shown that the House of Commons, as regards the present Ministry and that particular subject, is in a very perplexing position, and this position increases its responsibility. For, with the greatest respect—without the slightest desire of giving offence to any Member of the House, which would be foreign to my nature—I must at once say that the country upon this question cannot bear a repetition of the manoeuvres of 1859. It cannot endure that a measure should be thrown out upon some cunning or capacious point of detail, and that then those who have incurred the responsibility should shrink from fulfilling their duty by carrying a measure on this subject. Well, then, we have to consider, under these difficult circumstances, what is the course that we ought to undertake; and, Sir, it does appear to us—considering that the House of Commons itself disturbed the settlement of 1832, considering that the House itself on five different occasions baffled the efforts of five Governments to secure that re-settlement which they have rendered necessary, considering also that with regard to those who at present sit on these Benches the House has prevented any measure which they brought forward from being submitted to criticism in detail by allowing it to go into Committee, and thus frustrated the fulfilment of the expectations of the country when they acceded to power—it does seem to us that in a position of so much difficulty it is wise to reflect whether there is not some course that should be pursued which, without diminishing the due responsibility of Ministers, would, at least, insure the House upon this question from such unfortunate mishaps as have on previous occasions been experienced by Governments that have attempted to deal with this question. It does seem to us that this is, from the causes that I have recapitulated, one of those cases—of great difficulty, no doubt, and surrounded by circumstances of exigency which cannot be denied—which have been contemplated by the wisdom of our Parliamentary practice; and that we are pursuing only a constitutional course when we presume to recommend to the House that before we introduce a Bill we may be permitted, upon its main principles, and upon other points of great and paramount importance, to ask the opinion of the House, and see whether they will sanction the course which we recommend. That, Sir, is a course which we believe to be, under the circumstances, strictly constitutional. It is a course which we believe ought not to be resorted to, unless the circumstances are circumstances of exigency; and when we appeal to the House to permit us to adopt that course, we say, without thrusting our individual feelings upon the House, that in so acting we are impelled by as pure a sense of public duty as ever influenced any body of men.

Sir, I will not notice the first and sovereign objection which may be urged, under ordinary circumstances, to a proposition of proceeding by way of Resolution in this House; because, if the circumstances to which I have now fully adverted, if the relations of the House to this subject of Parliamentary Reform, if the necessity of bringing this question to a settlement, are not sufficient, I have no arguments to urge. But there are other objections to that course which have been offered, and on which for a moment I will dwell. It is said that there are disadvantages in proceeding by way of Resolution, independent of the great constitutional objection which nothing but exigency could override, and the first is that to proceed by Resolutions induces delay. Well, Sir, in answer to that I say, with great respect, that I do not think proceeding by Resolutions does induce delay. I have no doubt that there may be circumstances in which men, or even the House, not unwilling to trifle with a question might lose a great deal of time upon Resolutions, and take steps which would make consequent legislation impossible, at least for that Session. But, Sir, assuming a case such as that which exists, and that the Resolutions are brought forward by a Ministry as the basis of legislation to which they will be prepared to proceed when the Resolutions are passed, I cannot myself believe that there is anything even in the theory of Resolutions which leads to delay. It is very true that you seem to do twice what, under ordinary circumstances, it might be necessary only to do once; but, then, the House knows very well that the discussions on principles which take place upon the second reading of a Bill, and upon all the various Amendments which opposition in the case of public measures gives opportunity for—that all those discussions are anticipated by the discussions on Resolutions, and that you may very well pair the discussions upon Resolutions against the discussions upon all the vital points of a measure. Practically, moreover, I do not find that proceeding by Resolutions upon great and important subjects, where otherwise there would be circumstances of great difficulty, has led to delay. The instances are not numerous, because the House has rarely adopted that method, and of course I am only referring to circumstances of an extraordinary character, not to cases where we are obliged by the orders of the House to have recourse to it; but on looking over the few instances that are recorded in the Journals of the House, it does not appear to me that proceeding by Resolutions has induced delay. Of this, at least, I am certain, that it has, I think, in every instance been followed by successful legislation, and that, generally speaking—indeed, with scarcely an exception—in the very year in which the Resolutions have been brought forward. The case of the India Resolutions is the last instance, and one with which we are all familiar; but I may remind those who were not then Members of the House, that there was a very strong struggle upon that measure. In that case, if my memory is not incorrect, between the passing of the last Resolution and the third reading of the India Bill the interval was only a month. Therefore, I do not think that the House upon reflection will object to proceed by Resolution on the groundless assumption that it will produce delay, if the House, should agree, to the principle I have previously advanced, that there are circumstances of extraordinary exigency which necessitate that course. Then it is said that Resolutions are vague. Well, Sir, I admit that Resolutions must be vague to a certain extent and in a certain sense. If you would produce Resolutions with all the precision of clauses in a Bill, there would not be the slightest necessity to go into Committee on Resolutions. The object of Resolutions is to obtain the opinion of the House upon the main principles on which your measure should be founded; and, upon all other questions in which the main principles are not concerned, but which may be of vast importance, to obtain the opinion of the House, and defer to that opinion if it does not approve them. With regard to the application of the principles to details, of course it would be the duty of the Government to submit with pleasure and readiness to all suggestions made by the House which might lead to a more perfect and complete measure.

Well, Sir, upon the ground of delay, I trust that our course will not be opposed. With regard to the vagueness of Resolutions, I will say this, that if a Ministry are determined, if the Resolutions are carried, to introduce a Bill, there is no body of men more interested in the precision of the Resolutions than the Government itself. It is not our interest to bring forward vague Resolutions. We want to get from the House such a sanction of our views, and such assistance by the expression of their own, as that we can bring in a Bill which will pass with promptitude. And therefore these vague Resolutions are exactly what we should avoid, as they would not assist us in our course. I want to meet this question fairly, because I am sure it will facilitate our future course if we can arrive as soon as possible, and as much as possible, at a mutual understanding. I will take one of the most difficult questions which can occur in the Resolutions. Our first Resolution probably must refer to the extension of the suffrage. Well, if I bring forward a Resolution which merely declares that it is expedient that there should be an extension of the suffrage in counties and boroughs, I should call that a vague Resolution. The House is agreed, and has agreed, not only in this but in preceding Houses, and in an unmistakable manner, that there should be a considerable extension of the suffrage in counties and boroughs; but the House, certainly not this House, has never yet formally stated the mode by which the extension should take place. But if a Resolution is brought forward proposing the mode by which extension should take place, either by the creation of other franchises or the reduction of existing tenures of franchise, why then you have a Resolution which advances the question. If, however, I am asked, as I am told I shall be asked, whether it is not useless to bring forward Resolutions on such a question as the franchise without defining and describing minutely the qualification, then I say that is an unreasonable condition. I say an unreasonable condition, because it is a condition impossible for any Government to comply with. If you propose a Resolution which declares that it is expedient the franchise should be extended by its reduction—that is a principle which, when laid down, cannot be misunderstood. But how are you to settle the amount of the franchise? Take your borough franchise—how can you fix in your Resolution, even if you agree to the principle of its reduction, the amount of your franchise, when that must depend upon principles not less important than the extension itself? I wish to illustrate this point. The amount of the franchise depends upon many considerations, but it depends mainly upon one principle of the greatest importance, and that is a principle on which this House has given an equivocal and ambiguous decision; yet without a right appreciation and a clear conception of which it is impossible to make any proposal to the House which can lead to a practical result. I mean the basis upon which your franchise shall rest—namely, the principle of rating. Until you decide what shall be the basis of your franchise, how is it possible in a Resolution to come forward and recommend a particular amount? I mention this because it may be thrown in our teeth if we do not propose the exact amount of the borough franchise that we are trifling with the subject, but I say that it is utterly impossible if you proceed by Resolution. You must have a Resolution to decide whether the basis of your franchise is to be rating or not. I will not trouble the House with too many details of the character of the Resolutions, which, if the House will give me the opportunity, I intend to propose. They will be, I hope, in the hands of Members to-morrow morning; but, perhaps, the House will permit me to advert to one or two points upon which I think it highly important this House should come to a clear and unequivocal decision. And I must say that I am anxious the House shall decide on what principle they mean to construct the House of Commons. Do they mean to re-construct it on the principle of the English Constitution; or do they mean to re-construct it on the principles of the Constitution of any other country? I think it very important that this question shall be decided.

Now, Sir, Her Majesty's Government intend, if they can, and if this House will allow them, to re-construct this House on the principles of the English Constitution. I will not advert to any remarks which I may have made before on this subject, or, at least, I should like not to advert to them, because it is painful to repeat oneself; but it is better to be wearisome than to be ambiguous on this subject. We think that the English Constitution is not a mere phrase. We believe that we live under a monarchy, modified in its action by the co-ordinate authority of Estates of the Realm, and we look upon the Commons of England, whom we represent, as one of those Estates. Sir, I know it has been said that this is merely an archæological view of the Constitution of England; but I think I can show the House that they will be very unwise if they quit, without due consideration, the ancient traditions of the polity under which they live, and under which this country has so singularly flourished. Undoubtedly, under the great vicissitudes of centuries, the relations between the Estates of the Realm in this country have greatly altered and changed. No doubt, the Commons whom we represent have absorbed the greater part of the authority which those Estates once themselves exercised; but I think I can show the House that this is no reason why we should forget the constitutional scheme under which this country has so long prospered, but rather, if deeply and fairly considered, why we should cling to that scheme as our only surviving guide against the impending perplexities that surround us. No doubt, the Commons of England, by the immense increase of population and property, have assumed a character with reference to the other Estates which never was contemplated in the days of the Plantagenets and the Tudors. But it is a very great error to suppose that it is merely the increase of population and property on the part of the Commons which has brought about the present form of the English Constitution and the present character and functions of the House of Commons. Take one of these Estates. Take the Peerage of England. That is a very powerful body. It is probably the wealthiest body in the world, and it possesses particularly the kind of property which is most popular in England, because it is a tenure connected with the fulfilment of duties—I mean the land. Nor are the power and influence of the Peerage to be measured by their property. Their social influence—I use the word in a large sense—their national influence, is very great. I have often myself felt that the power of the Peerage is greater in every part of England than in their own House. What, then, has placed the Commons of England in the commanding position which they now occupy? It is the development of our financial Constitution. It is the claim that we asserted two centuries ago—partially recognised then, and now completely established, which has practically placed in this House the taxing power. That is the cause of the position and character of the Commons of England. The moment that power was established, every class, every interest in this country, sought representation in this House, and naturally, because in this House alone can they defend their rights and their property. People complain of the influence, the undue influence, of the Peerage, in the House of Commons. Why, Sir, the influence of the Peerage in the House of Commons is not a usurpation of our rights: it is a deference to our authority. And so it is with all interests. Here they come because here power is reposed, and it is here only that they can be guarded in respect to the exercise of that power by the presence of their representatives. The consequence is that every class and every interest has sought, and to a certain degree has obtained, representation in this House. That is the cause of the variety of our character. But is it the variety of our character that has given us our deliberative power? It is our deliberative power that has given us our hold upon the Executive; and it is this hold upon the Executive which is the best, ay, the only security for our freedom.

Well, Sir, Her Majesty's Government can counsel and countenance no course that will change that varied character of the House of Commons; they respect and reverence the causes which have elevated a rude popular Assembly of the days of the Plantagenets into a Senate which commands the admiration of the world. We do not find that there is any security for retaining that character unless we oppose a policy which gives to any class in this country—I care not whether it be high or low, whether it be influenced by a democratical or by an oligarchical feeling—a preponderant power in this House. And therefore, in any measures that we may bring forward, we shall assert that the elective franchise must be regarded as a popular privilege, and not as a democratic right. If, Sir, we wanted to see what are the consequences of allowing one class in a popular Assembly to have a preponderating influence, what is passing in the world at the present time is fruitful of instruction. I never presume to criticize the institutions of other States. Indeed, I hold, and hold most sincerely, as a general principle, that the institutions of every country are pretty well adapted to the population who live under them. But, take the instance of our nearest neighbour. There is France, in the very van of civilization, perhaps—if I were not in the House of Commons and in England I might even venture to say—the first of European nations, inferior to none in vivacity of mind, in acute intellect, in wonderful perseverance, and in that patriotic feeling which always follows. Well, this gifted nation has a popular Assembly, and it is elected by universal suffrage. Does any one pretend that the Legislative Assembly of France is equal in European consideration to the House of Commons? If there be any Englishman who thinks that the Legislative Assembly of France can claim that position, I am sure there is no Frenchman who does so. But it may be asserted that our institutions are not suited to a Latin race, and that the Constitution of France was suddenly and rudely invented under circumstances of disorder and disturbance. Well, then take the case of the United States of America. There you have a House of Representatives, framed by the children of our loins, and certainly under the inspiration of as pure a patriotism as ever existed. That also is elected by universal suffrage. But does anyone contend that the House of Representatives at Washington can equal in authority the House of Commons? And what is the cause of this? Why, no doubt the American nation is inferior to us in no point; it is of the same blood, the same brains, the same intelligence, of equal energy, perhaps of more enterprize; but the House is elected by one class; there is no variety in it. And so the Legislative Assembly of America, like that of France, can neither of them rule the country in which it is established. I would hardly venture to refer to another case, but there is one further example for our guidance. You have now a German Parliament instituted. Now, I am proud of our countrymen, but I do not suppose there is any man in this House at this moment who will pretend that for intellectual power we are superior to the German nation. That gifted people have now a Parliament; that Parliament is elected by universal suffrage, and we find that the Ministers of the King are not to sit in it. Thus we have these extremely popular and representative institutions elected by one preponderating class; and what do we see are the consequences? Why, that the Assembly loses all that which we believe, and justly believe, to be the characteristic of the House of Commons. It loses it from the want of that variety of elements which gives various wisdom, various knowledge, deliberative power, and, by deliberative power, such a moral command over society that it willingly intrusts to it a great portion of the Executive of the country.

Well, Sir, with these views, considering the doctrines that are now preached, the violent, the thoughtless, the pernicious doctrines which are now circulated, we cannot pretend to enter upon the laborious and responsible task which we are otherwise willing to undertake, unless the House of Commons will, by some Resolution, declare an opinion in harmony with the general sentiment I have now expressed. There are other subjects on which I think it is of the utmost importance that the House should come to a decision, and by its coming to a decision upon which subsequent legislation may be greatly facilitated. I need refer but slightly to the principle to which I have adverted as the basis of our legislation on the franchise—namely, the principle of rating. I admit that in the year 1859, having endeavoured to bring forward a scheme which founded our suffrage on that principle, I was reluctantly obliged to give it up, the difficulties were then so great, the anomalies so glaring, and the consequences to which it would have led so absurd. But since that time the course of legislation in this House has greatly lessened those difficulties. A Bill introduced by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers) on the subject of union rating, has greatly contributed to this result. But I hope that to-night my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hunt) will have an opportunity of bringing in a measure which will entirely remove all the remaining difficulties connected with this matter. Under these circumstances, we trust the House will assent to a Resolution affirming that rating shall be the basis of the franchise.

Sir, there are one or two other points to which, if I am not wearying the House, I should like to allude. Among them is one of the most difficult of all questions—namely, the distribution of seats. Now, upon that subject there are two schools of opinion, which are as much at variance as upon the subject of the franchise itself. There is a school that would re-construct the electoral map of England. We hear sometimes that the map of Europe is to be re-constructed. There is also a school in this country which would re-construct the electoral map of England. On the other hand, there are those who approach this question with great hesitation. They find an ancient and complex arrangement, but, at the same time, one which, for a considerable period, has contributed, as they think, to the representation of a country like England, having a variety of interests, with success. It is impossible in this country to think on this subject and not to be struck by the apparently providential manner in which an almost obscure island in the days of the Norman Kings, with but a limited population and slight resources, has developed itself into a magnificent and unparalleled Empire. Through the rude institutions of the Plantagenets and Tudors, however, the means have been found of representing interests so vast, so various, so infinitely complex, as those which are bound up with the England of the present day. Those who are impressed with that conviction will, I am sure, concur with me in the opinion that upon the question of the re-distribution of seats we must proceed with the utmost circumspection. Any attempt to portion, according to certain symmetrical arrangements, the representation of the country would probably end in altering the character of this House, and, by altering its character, deprive it of its authority. I think that before we introduce our Bill we have a right to ask the House to give us their opinion upon, and I hope their sanction to, certain principles upon which we propose to act. One of those principles is that no borough should, so far as the re-distribution of seats is concerned, be wholly disfranchised. We are in favour of this principle for two reasons. We look upon it, in the first place, as wise and necessary that the representation of the country should, as far as lies in our power, be distributed; and we regard it as unwise and unnecessary to disturb any centre of representation, because it is impossible, in an age of rapid growth, when communities so rapidly rise and vanish, when the changes and alterations of social arrangements are so evanescent, to proceed with too much circumspection. Speaking, then, for myself and my Colleagues, we are of opinion that no borough should be wholly disfranchised so far as the re-distribution of seats is concerned—for I am far from saying that if bribery be proved to exist in a borough, as we have reason to fear and believe it may be in the case of some—we ought to show ourselves more deficient in spirit than our predecessors, and I trust, under such circumstances, we should know how to act. Our main—mind, I do not say our sole—consideration, in altering the apportionment of the representation would, in the second place, be to supply representatives to places now unrepresented, but which are, from a variety of causes, entitled to the privilege. These are the two principles by which we would be guided on the question of the re-distribution of seats; and unless we have from the House their sanction with respect to these two points all our arrangements must prove perfectly useless, for hon. Members must feel that we might then have an Amendment on the second reading of the Bill which we might introduce, founded, perhaps, on the case of some obscure borough, but so ingeniously worded that the fate of the measure might depend upon it. I have to apologize to the House for having gone so much into detail—although I have endeavoured to confine myself to those Resolutions which appeared to me to involve large principles; but there is another point on which I think it my duty to touch slightly—a point with which it has been found difficult to deal, which is a very important element in the settlement of this question of Reform, and upon which I venture to say a greater amount of misapprehension exists than almost upon any other—I allude to the subject of boundaries.

Now, I have, on more than one occasion, not completely, but casually, expressed the views which I entertain upon this subject. It is really a vital subject, and one, it appears to me, on which no dissension ought to prevail, for if clearly understood there would be, I imagine, scarcely any room for a difference of opinion in regard to it. Unfortunately, however, it is not clearly understood, and it has had raised in connection with it objections which have had a very considerable effect on the House, although they are objections based upon false data, and supported by false reasoning. If I again remind hon. Members of the salient facts of the case, it is because I am anxious to place a distinct picture before their minds. The amount of the population dwelling in counties is 11,500,000, and that population is represented in the House of Commons by 162 Members. 9,500,000 is the extent of the population living in boroughs, and the number of Members representing it within these walls is 334. Now, one would naturally say, at the first glance, that there is nothing unreasonable in the 11,500,000 asking the House of Commons that, as they have but a very small share of the representation, the enjoyment of their rights should at least not be interfered with by the 9,500,000 in boroughs. Hon. Members must, it seems to me, feel the justice of that appeal. We know that since 1832 the population of boroughs has greatly increased, and that they have passed the borough boundaries to the extent of millions. The population of the counties has also considerably increased; but they are on that account all the more anxious for the due enjoyment of their privileges. The population of towns, however, has, I repeat, passed their boundaries in millions, and if you greatly reduce, as we propose to do, the franchise in counties, a large proportion of the population of boroughs will become county electors. Well, the 11,500,000 with 162 Members look on that as rather hard, for they naturally think that the surplus population of the boroughs ought to be contented with their 334 Members. This is not an idle apprehension or unfounded complaint on their side. If you reduce to-morrow, as you will do if you follow our advice, the county franchise, you will have half the town of Halifax—I give this as a mere illustration—not more distinct from the other half than the City of Westminster is from the City of London—supplying a large body of electors to the county of Yorkshire. Why should not that body of men vote for a candidate with whom all their sympathies, local and municipal, are bound up? And are the 11,500,000, with only 162 Members, to be visited by an invasion that will still further materially diminish their privilege in sending men representing their views to Parliament? In my opinion, the question is one about which there ought to be no controversy; but there is, nevertheless, with respect to it a great controversy, a bitter controversy, which, like all great and bitter controversies, arises from an ignorance of the subject to which the argument relates. It is contended that no revision of the boundaries between boroughs and counties must be attempted, because it would be difficult rigidly and severely to distinguish one class of population from the other. Now, to do this is not only difficult, it is impossible. No one ever contemplated such a division. Those populations must to a certain degree blend, and it is desirable they should blend. But cases of great injustice like that I have mentioned—and there are twenty such cases which I could name—should not, therefore, be allowed to pass without a remedy, and the remedy, I maintain, can be rendered perfectly consistent with that natural blending to which I just now referred. The great objection, however, which is urged against a revision of boundaries—and I put it, I hope, fairly in its naked form, for I have no wish to cast a veil over it—is that it is a plan which, if adopted with other schemes of an analogous though not so important a character, such as giving representatives to some boroughs, would throw the 162 county Members entirely into the hands of the landlords, their tenants, and labourers. [“Hear, hear!”] Well, you accept that proposition? I am sorry for you, for it is a totally erroneous proposition. This is a case of great importance, and I do not think that any part of a future Reform Bill can be really more important, or more to the interest of both parties clearly to understand. In the 11,500,000 of population to which I have referred, there will, no doubt, be a considerable diminution, if our propositions are adopted. We shall propose to enfranchise boroughs which may diminish that amount by hundreds of thousands. There would then still remain in England a vast number of towns which by no wise scheme of Parliamentary representation can be or ought to be enfranchised. I give you the advantages of all their population, and still there remain in England, as appears by the evidence on the table, what is termed, in the technical language of statistics, a scattered or village population which does not live in towns, even of towns of 1,500 population, and which amounts to upwards of 9,000,000, being equal to the amount of the population of all the represented boroughs of England. But you say that this is only composed of landlords, farmers, and labourers, and why care for them? The landlords, farmers, and labourers are registered in the Census, and still form alone the most important class in England from their property and numbers combined. That class comprises 2,000,000 of the population, and if you take away all the landlords, farmers, and labourers, what is your duty to the 7,000,000 of the population that remains in the counties, and what are those 7,000,000 of population? They are the backbone of the country. I say that for independence, industry, for the comparative simplicity of their lives, and, whatever may be their creed, whether Churchman or Dissenter, for their deep and sincere religious convictions, there is no part of the population more deserving of esteem. On this subject of the population of the counties there does exist in this enlightened metropolis a degree of want of information which is perfectly astonishing. I do not like to refer to some opinions which have been lately circulated by one who has always been my political opponent while in this House, but whom I have always respected, and more than respected, who, I think, was a great honour to this House, and whose memorable achievements should never be forgotten. Still I was astonished to learn from that high authority that the cause of all the discontent prevailing in England on the subject of the representation of the people was the enfranchisement of the farmers of this country some thirty or forty years ago. I think that I have rather indicated to-night, at the beginning of my task, the real cause of the dissatisfaction at the present day with respect to the Reform Act of 1832. It has not been caused by the enfranchisement of the farmers of England, but by the disfranchisement of the workmen of England. On the subject of the two kinds of population to which I was adverting, the most extraordinary want of information appears to exist. Look to those 7,000,000 of your population which I just now alluded to. Who are they? Among them are ancient freeholders of England, to whom we are indebted for our public liberties. Without referring to historical recollections, but speaking only in reference to the latest and greatest political measure—the passing of the Reform Act, which, when I first entered the House, was never mentioned except with enthusiasm, but is now only named with contumely;—I say, it was the freeholders of England in the counties of England who carried that measure. There are among those 7,000,000 of the population I have adverted to, 300,000 and more freeholders. If you look to the amount of the county constituency, and if you take away the 100,000 of occupying tenants, as well as all those freeholders who vote for the counties in respect of freeholds in boroughs, you will find that you take away two-fifths of the county electoral body, and you leave more than 300,000 freeholders, who, among the 7,000,000 of population I have mentioned, seem utterly unknown by this House, and not only by this House, but by men occupying the highest position in the State. When I ask justice for those freeholders I am told in return I want to eliminate all the independence and all the intelligence of the counties. I have never recommended any violent destruction of the existing electoral scheme in order that adequate representation might be given to those men, because I felt the disturbance would do them far more harm than good; but if there are to be only 162 county representatives in this country, merely gradually increasing in number when opportunities may occur—if that is to be the principle of your system, then you are bound to let this part of the population enjoy the rights which the Constitution intended, and to provide that the county Members should be elected by the county population and not by the borough population, which also has the power to elect Members to this House. Under these circumstances, the Government have prepared a Resolution which will propose a course calculated, we hope, to do justice on this long-vexed question, as, when calmly considered, it will be acknowledged to be founded on principles of truth and equity. I hope no opposition will be offered to the course we propose, and that we at last shall reconcile this great portion of the people to our new arrangements by making them feel that they are no longer debarred from the enjoyment of the privileges which the Constitution meant to give them. Why, the other day a rampant orator, who goes about the country maligning men and things, attacked the House of Commons under the thin veil of a lecture on the reign of Charles I., and after alluding to two illustrious men who then existed, went out of his way to assail me, saying, "Where now are the 4,000 freeholders of Buckinghamshire?" Why, Sir, they are where you would naturally expect to find them. They are in the county of Buckingham. I can pardon this wild man, who has no experience of life, having probably always lived in the cloisters of some college, making these mistakes; but I cannot pardon grave and eminent statesmen falling into the error of describing the tenant farmers as the preponderating portion of the county constituencies. There is no subject on which so much exaggeration exists as on the subject of occupying tenants in counties. They never at any time exceeded one-fifth of the constituency, and that number is divided between the two great parties in the State. How, therefore, is it possible that they can exercise the influence which is alleged? In my own county, where, according to the lecturer, there are nothing but tenant farmers, there happens to be, in a constituency of 6,000, only 1,200 registered occupying tenants. But you will not do justice to the county constituency, because you have been induced to believe extravagant representations.

I have thus, Sir, endeavoured as far as I could to place before the House the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take upon this great question, which has been so long discussed, and the discussion upon which they feel it so necessary to bring to a conclusion—I hope, a satisfactory one. I have stated not only the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to the House, and which they earnestly hope the House will adopt, but I have also endeavoured to convey to them so far as I could, without reserve, the spirit in which these Resolutions are framed. I say "without reserve," because I could have signified our policy and waited for discussions upon the matter; but I thought it would rather facilitate our proceedings if I did without reserve impress on the House the general principles on which we wish to act, and the spirit in which we do act. Do not let the House suppose that we are asking them to go into Committee and allow us to propose Resolutions because we are angling for a policy. We are not angling for a policy. We have distinct principles which will guide us, and which we wish the House to sanction. But there are several subjects besides those which I have indicated, if not of equal still of very great importance in the happy settlement of this question, upon which it would be desirable that the opinion of the House should be given; and on these subjects we should defer to the opinion of the House. If we go into this Committee to move Resolutions, in the application of those principles we should consult in every way the sense and accept the suggestions of the House. And although we are not prepared in any way to shrink from the leading principles of the policy that we hope may be sanctioned, we still believe that on a question of this paramount importance, if the House deigns to co-operate with us and come into council with us, many suggestions of great value will be made which may add to the fulness and completion of the consummation. I can only say on the part of my Colleagues that those suggestions will be received not merely with candour, but, if found to deserve the acceptance of the House and appear for the public advantage, they will be accepted with gratitude. We shall enter into the Committee and avail ourselves of all that the learning, the genius, the experience of the House can suggest for the solution of this question; and to all we shall give a cordial and a candid deference. The course we adopt is not one flattering to ourselves [Ironical cheers]; but it is more flattering to assist, however humbly, in effecting that which he thinks is for the public good than to bring forward mock measures which he knows the spirit of party will not pass. And let me tell the Member for Birmingham, who gave me that ironical cheer, that there are others besides himself who think that it is desirable that this question should be settled, but who wish it to be settled in the spirit of the English Constitution. Of course, it would be very agreeable to us to bring forward at once a complete measure, backed by a confiding majority, and having the assurance of settling a question which engages the attention of a great nation. None of my Colleagues pretend to be superior to

But, Sir, this is not a time in which we are to consider the complacency of Ministers, or even the pride of parties. I earnestly hope that the House of Commons will rise to this occasion. I earnestly hope that the House of Commons, in unison with that gracious Speech which Her Majesty delivered to her Parliament, authorized by antecedent circumstances, and urged by the necessity of the case, will divest itself of party feeling, and give her Ministers on this, if on no other occasion, the advantage of their co-operation and their cordial support.

Sir, some sharp things have been said about the House of Commons since we parted in the summer—some sharp things, not with reference merely to its present character, but to its past conduct, which I thought had been accepted, sanctioned, and embalmed by history. I do not doubt that this human institution is not free from the imperfections of humanity. It is possible that there may have been periods when the integrity even of the House of Commons might successfully have been impugned. I know well—we all know that there have been times when its conduct has been unjust, violent, even tyrannical. If you search our records, unquestionably you will find conclusions on many subjects that are at variance with those doctrines which are the happier appanage of our more enlightened times. But, Sir, there is no greater error than to judge the morals of one age by the manners of a subsequent one. There is no greater error than to decide upon the passions of perilous times with the philosophic calmness of assured security. There is no greater error than to gauge the intellect of the past by its deficiencies, and not by the accumulated wisdom which it has achieved, and which has become our beneficent inheritance. Those who take a larger and a nobler view of human affairs will, I think, recognise that, alone in the countries of Europe, England now for almost countless generations has by her Parliament exhibited the fair exemplar of free government; and that throughout the awful vicissitudes of her heroic history she has, chiefly by this House of Commons, maintained and cherished that public spirit which is the soul of Commonwealths, without which Empire has no glory, and the wealth of nations is but the means of corruption and decay. Sir, I move that on the 25th of February this House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to take into consideration the 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45.

MR. GLADSTONE said: Without, Sir, in any manner derogating from the ability of the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has just delivered, I venture to observe—and I think many will concur in the observation—it is one which does not of itself necessarily carry censure—that the House is placed in a somewhat peculiar position. We are to approach the discussion of a subject of unparalleled difficulty, and one which has undoubtedly been embittered in other times by proceedings which, whether justified by the spirit of party and the ordinary usages of Parliament or not, yet certainly has been in a high degree obstructive of public progress—we are to approach the discussion of this question now on the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman in a manner, I think, altogether novel. I am not about to discuss at length the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman, which will be best considered when we hold them, in their express terms, in our hands; still less am I about to offer to the House, as I hope, any one remark which may diminish the expectations or the hopes that any one of us may entertain of making the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Government the basis of a settlement of the question. But there were remarks contained in the speech of the right hon.

Gentleman which I do not feel able to pass by altogether in silence. The right hon. Gentleman, in the early part of his speech, laid much stress upon certain terms contained in Her Majesty's Speech—terms, I think, not very commonly found in Speeches from the Throne—instructing this House as to the temper in which it was to deal with this subject; and the signification which the right hon. Gentleman, no doubt with great authority, attaches to those words is this, that the subject of Parliamentary Reform is no longer to be a question whereon the fate of a Ministry is to depend. Now, Sir, there is no more grave and difficult question that can arise for the consideration of the responsible Ministers of the Crown than to determine what are and what are not the occasions upon which the failure and rejection of their propositions constitute a sufficient cause for the resignation of their offices. If that general proposition be sustained, as I think it is both by opinion and by experience, there immediately follows from it this consequence—that the Executive Government ought on every occasion to retain in its own hands an unimpeded and unfettered power of considering that most difficult question with reference to its own dignity and honour, and to the interests of the country according to the circumstances that may arise. Those circumstances, Sir, it is impossible to define and to forecast in anticipation of the events; and I own to entertaining a doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman has so far conduced to the easier or more satisfactory prospect of settling this question by the announcement beforehand of something like an abstract and binding proposition to the effect that it is to be one which is not to involve the fate of the Government. That, however, is a matter more, perhaps, for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues than for those who are less connected with them; but the principle announced by the right hon. Gentleman is one of such importance, and I confess that in my own mind it is one open to so much doubt, that I could not allow it to pass without a remark against it. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to give us a lengthened historical disquisition upon the transactions that have taken place in previous Sessions, and in previous Parliaments, with regard to measures of Parliamentary Reform. I wish, Sir, to give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of correcting me on a future occasion if I should unfortunately misrepresent his meaning in consequence of having been unable sufficiently to comprehend him. But I did not clearly gather from his speech what was the precise inference that he intended us to draw from that recital. It appeared to me that his object was to show that there was a special responsibility of this House, as distinguished from the Government which ordinarily directs its proceedings, with reference to the subject of Parliamentary Reform. If that be all that is intended to be established by that recital I have no difficulty, as far as I am personally concerned, in subscribing to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman; for although the opinion, when I expressed it, was much objected to—and objected to, perhaps, in quarters where there may be more sympathy with it to-night—I did entertain, and strongly entertain, the opinion that the House itself—from the action on various occasions of its independent Members—has incurred in the eyes of the country a special responsibility with reference to the question of Reform. But I understood the right hon. Gentleman to go beyond the limits of that proposition, and by his announcement that he leaves us to imply that, together with the increase of the responsibility of the House of Commons there was a diminution of the responsibility of the Government, and that an exceptional state of things had arisen in which it would be expedient for, if not imperative, upon this House to effect a settlement of this difficult question under some guidance or leadership—the right hon. Gentleman does not say in what degree—of Government, such guidance or leadership to be connected with a responsibility different in kind and also in weight from that which usually attaches to the Advisers of the Crown. If that be so, I must confess that I am doubtful whether the announcement of such a view on the part of the Leader of this House will add to the weight or to the authority with which his propositions should be placed before us, and which, attaching as it justly does under all circumstances to the proposals of the Executive in this country, is of itself one of the great propelling forces by which important measures are successfully carried through this House. The right hon. Gentleman has announced, with reference to the subject of Parliamentary Reform, his intention of proceeding by Resolution—an intention with which we were already acquainted from information that had reached us from various quarters. I will not enter into any full discussion of that method of proceeding, although I frankly own my prepossessions to be against it. I think that that method of proceeding is justifiable, and even necessary, in cases of a particular description; in a case, for example, where it is necessary to obtain the concurrence of both Houses, it is obvious that the simultaneous concurrence of both Houses could not be had except by adopting the practice of proceeding by Resolution. I will not, however, ask what are the precise limits to which this method of proceeding should be confined; but the right hon. Gentleman, having dwelt upon the subject fully, has failed to satisfy my mind that this method of doing things twice over instead of once has not, as a general rule, some tendency to cause delay. The right hon. Gentleman, in touching upon the second and more important point, admitted that vagueness was almost inseparable from the nature of Resolutions—that is to say, that if Resolutions are to be passed with greater facility than would be the case were the same propositions embodied in a Bill, the right hon. Gentleman admits that those Resolutions must necessarily be exceedingly vague in their nature. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has shadowed forth in his speech to-night the principal points which are to be included in the Resolutions that he is about to propose, and I wish to state with the utmost clearness what, as far as my humble opinion is concerned, should be the course of the independent Members of this House. I have already said that, under the circumstances, I do not ask what might be asked on other occasions—how far the Government which makes this proposal is in possession of the general confidence of the House; and I now go further and say that the objections I entertain to this mode of procedure will not stand in my way—and should not, I think, stand in the way of others—if, notwithstanding this mode of procedure, we can use the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman—either by adopting them as they stand, or by altering them—as a means of arriving at a settlement of this question. Those scruples which I felt with regard to the method of proceeding by way of Resolution I shall cast behind me if, upon examining those Resolutions, I find it possible for us to make an onward movement.

The right hon. Gentleman has told us something of his propositions, and in reference to them I must observe that I think we are bound to avoid everything that tends to adjourn the settlement of this question. In whatever form these Resolutions are laid before us a long period of time must elapse before this great and fundamental question can be settled. I am not altogether assured, after having heard the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the rating franchise, that the matter will be disposed of with the requisite speed. If I am to interpret in the ordinary manner the terms of the notice which stands upon the notice-books of the House, it is clear that very important changes in the law of rating are contemplated, changes such as it is impossible for this House to adopt in a moment. Is it meant that the question of Parliamentary Reform is to depend upon the previous attainment of what the right hon. Gentleman may think a perfect system of rating? I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he cannot fix the amount of the reduction in the franchise in his first Resolution, because that may depend upon the points to be disposed of by subsequent Resolutions; but does not the right hon. Gentleman see that many Members would refuse—would justly refuse—to commit themselves to an abstract principle of reduction unless they knew what form that reduction was to take? Again, if it be true that the amount of this reduction is to depend upon some subsequent Resolution with reference to an alteration to be made in the law of rating, I hope I may dismiss the apprehension which I confess a part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman raised in my mind, that this method of proceeding by way of Resolution is calculated to defer the definitive settlement of the question of Parliamentary Reform. I beg the right hon. Gentleman, if he thinks it worth his while, to consider that as an illustration of what I mean. The very same motives as would lead me, for one, with the utmost earnestness to co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman, and to build on his foundations, if possible, for a speedy settlement of the question, would likewise lead me, I frankly own, to offer a determined opposition to any proposition, or any method of proceeding, which would appear to me to be likely to cast it into the far future. We cannot afford to go on in this country as we are going. It is time that this discord between classes—this tendency to discord—this incipient discord—this tendency to separate interests, from indications of which I must say the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, in that portion of it in which he referred to the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, was not altogether free—it is time that all this should cease; and not till this question of Reform has disappeared from among the subjects of controversy can we hope to see the people of England what they once were, and what we ought to be desirous they should ever continue to be—a united people. The right hon. Gentleman has told us the day on which he proposes to proceed with his Resolutions. I think it better to reserve till then any opinion on the important question—perhaps the vital question—whether his Resolutions do constitute a plan to which the House can assent if they agree, and on which they can join issue, if they do not agree, with the right hon. Gentleman. No objection will be taken otherwise than as matter of argument and representation with respect to the mode of proceeding. I have just intimated the direction in which we are disposed to look, and the rule by which our conduct will be guided. Our object being to make progress in this question—and we think the country has a right to expect that—we will gladly assist the right hon. Gentleman, if he concurs with us in this view of the matter, in giving effect to his idea so far as we are able consistently to do so. But I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not expect us to be a party to a course of proceeding which would amount in effect to an absolute betrayal of public duty—that is to say, to the adoption of his Resolutions if we find them to be measures—not measures, but declarations preliminary to measures—a course tending to produce doubt and uncertainty in the public mind—tending to diminish the confidence of the people in Parliament—tending to adjourn a conclusion for which, on every ground, it is desirable that we should look without delay. The right hon. Gentleman asked the question, and I think it was a natural remark to make—"Upon what principle the House of Commons was to be re-constructed?" He answered that it ought to be upon the principle of the British Constitution. Then, spreading his wings for an extended flight, he travelled both Eastward and Westward, and gave us an account of the Representative Chambers of various foreign countries. Sir, I very much doubt the wisdom of those self-complacent allusions to the institutions of foreign countries. It sometimes happens that our views of them are not altogether accurate, and at best they cannot be expected to carry on them the stamp of impartiality. Were this the time and place, I should be disposed to challenge some particulars in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman; but, even if those statements were strictly accurate, I very much doubt whether much is gained by comparisons of this description. The right hon. Gentleman must, however, see that he is engaged in a combat with a phantom; for has any Government in this country at any time proposed to deal with the question of Parliamentary Reform on any other principles than those of the British Constitution? I assert that we have been ready at all times—and never more so than last year—to contend that it was upon those principles we took our stand. It is true there may be differences of opinion amongst us as to various points of detail; but, however widely we may differ upon questions of general policy, I do not believe that any one Member in this House would be willing to depart from the principles of the British Constitution. I frankly own it appears to me that in the expression of his opinions the right hon. Gentleman himself has somewhat departed from the principles of the British Constitution; but am I to rise in my place and assume that I have the exclusive possession of the key of those principles? Or am I to charge the right hon. Gentleman or any other Member of this House with the abandonment of all regard for them? I ask the right hon. Gentleman to enlarge his toleration so far as to believe that even those who have differed from him on former occasions, and who may ultimately differ from him in the later development of this question—to believe that whether they differ from him or not, they are animated equally with himself by a regard for that glorious Constitution, the rich traditions and noble inheritance which it has left us, and that whilst upholding their rights of freedom they claim for themselves and their opinions that consideration which we gladly and freely accord to others.

Motion agreed to.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HUNT, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for a common basis of value for the purposes of Government and Local Taxation, and to promote uniformity in the assessment of Rateable Property in England, said, he hoped, notwithstanding the all-absorbing character of the subject that had just been brought before the House, that they would consider that this was one of considerable importance, and that they would bear with him whilst he explained, but not at great length, what he considered the evils of our present system of valuation, and how he proposed to remedy it. The evils of the present system had long been felt. In 1850 Sir George Lewis gave evidence before a Committee of the House of Lords on the subject. That Committee made certain recommendations, having reference not only to valuations of local rates, but they recommended, as a principle, that assessments should be made on one uniform and equal relative valuation. In the same year a Bill was brought in by Sir George Lewis and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), to establish the principle of universal valuation for poor rates throughout the country, and it had occurred to the present Government that that principle might be carried still farther, and that the same valuation might be used both for local and Imperial purposes. What the Government looked to was what in reference to the poor rates answered to the gross estimated rental. The income tax, with regard to real property, was levied on the gross value, whilst the local rates were levied on the rateable or net value of the property; but notwithstanding that difference, the gross value was really the basis of value, because it was from that that certain deductions were made and the rateable value ascertained for local purposes. He would now briefly describe the present system of valuation both for the purpose of taxation and for the purpose of rating. And first with regard to taxation, in which he was most immediately concerned, and on account of which he had been intrusted with the conduct of this measure. The primary assessments were made by local assessors, and then the Government officer and assessor of taxes had the power of reviewing those assessments and making surcharges on persons named in the list. The district Commissioners, who were independent persons, had to decide in cases where the taxpayers did not assent to the surcharges made by the surveyor, and there was no appeal from those Commissioners, except as far as they might state points of law for the decision of the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster. With regard to matters of fact, there was no appeal from their decision. As regarded local taxation, the system was as follows:—The Boards of Guardians annually appointed out of their own body a committee to assess, and that committee consisted of one-third of ex officio guardians—namely, justices of the peace resident in the union, supposing there were any justices resident—and, if not, their places were supplied by the ordinary members of the Board of Guardians. The lists were made out by the parish officers and submitted to the assessment committee, who then made out the assessment upon these lists, with any alterations which they might deem expedient to make after hearing the objections of the persons assessed, or of other persons upon the same lists or residing in the same union. Supposing any dissatisfaction were felt at the decisions of the assessment committee, there was an appeal, which was final, to the quarter sessions. But that was not the only assessment made with regard to local taxation. One would have thought that a system which was good for the purpose of the poor rate, the highway rate, and church rates, would likewise have been good for the county rate; but it would be found that the magistrates at quarter sessions had the power to appoint a committee for the county rating. They might make a new basis, and in practice it was known that they did so. He understood that at the present moment the committees of magistrates and quarter sessions were making a new basis for county rates, notwithstanding that the assessment for the poor rate had only just been completed in their own county. It was true that the quarter sessions committee did not go into the same particulars as the assessment committees, because they only assessed parishes, whereas the assessment committees assessed individual property; but it often happened that the assessment made for the county rate in a parish was wholly different in amount from the poor rate assessment in the same parish. In the case of county rates also there was an appeal to the quarter sessions. But then this extraordinary state of things arose. A man had to watch the assessment on his property for property tax, for poor rates, and for parish and county rates. He might appeal in one case and his appeal might be sustained, but that would not affect any other assessment to which he was assessed. On the contrary, he would have to go through the same process in regard to all the three assessments. All the labour with regard to one valuation was entirely thrown away with regard to the others. He might have gone more into detail in regard to this matter, but he thought he had stated enough to satisfy the House that the existing system was one not creditable to the country. Then the question arose as to what was to be substituted for the three systems without parting with any of the present jurisdictions of the Government, the Poor Law officers, the Boards of Guardians, or the magistrates. If they were to commence entirely afresh, perhaps it would be easy to devise a simple scheme which might serve for all purposes, but the Government had determined to make use of the existing machinery. Before 1862 there was much more inequality in rating than at present, because the parish made out the valuation lists and fixed upon the scale of deductions, the consequence of which was that there might be different scales of deduction in the same union. That system, however, had to a certain extent been modified by the union assessment committees, and therefore within the union itself there was now a uniform scale of deductions. Still the uniformity did not extend beyond the area of the union. The Bills to which he had just now alluded attempted to provide for uniformity as regards counties, and the Bill which he was about to ask leave to introduce also provided for uniformity as regards counties. He proposed to take as the basis of valuation the present system of union assessment, and that the assessment committee should send representatives to a County Valuation Board, to consist of the representatives of all the assessment committees in the county—for the most part two members from each committee—one of such representatives to be an ex officio member, and the other an ordinary member. It was proposed to include in the area of the county all the towns lying within it, but the towns were to be represented on the same principle at the Valuation Board. If they already had separate committees they would send members to the Valuation Board, and if they had no committees they might appoint members to serve on the Board. In the event of there being no magistrates who could serve, it was proposed that the Town Councils should nominate members of the Board. The functions of the Valuation Board would have reference almost exclusively to the scale of deductions, and they would have nothing to do with the assessment of gross value except in certain cases. The Valuation Board would have to lay down the scale of deductions to be observed in all the assessment committees throughout the country. It was likewise proposed that the Valuation Board should perform the duties of the assessment committees at the expense of those committees in those cases where the assessment committees delayed to discharge the duties imposed on them by Act of Parliament. The effect of that enactment would, in all probability, be that the assessment committees would perform their duties within the proper time. With regard to gross value, it was proposed that the overseers should make out the valuation lists, as at present. But here a new element would be introduced into the assessment system, for the surveyor of taxes would have a locus standi before the assessment committees, and the power of stating what, in his opinion, was the right sum of the gross value, and consequently of throwing the onus probandi of disproving his statement on the taxpayers and ratepayers. Thus for the first time there would be some one present who would have an interest in putting up the assessment to the right point. That, he believed, would have the effect of preventing too low assessments being made. It was also proposed that when the assessments had been made by the committees they should be sent up to the Valuation Board, who would take care that their instructions with regard to the scale of deductions had been fully carried out. An appeal would be allowed to an assessor, who would be a barrister-at-law, and who would be appointed by the Valuation Board, with the consent of the Treasury. The quarter sessions would thereby be discharged of their present appellate function, and a system, something like that now existing in Ireland, would be adopted. On the application of the parties the assessor would be empowered to order a survey and valuation of any property in respect to which a dispute had arisen. A union might appeal against the assessment of another union, and a parish against the assessment of another parish. The assessor being appointed by the Valuation Board subject to the control of the Treasury, the Imperial interests would be properly guaranteed, and, at the same time, he would be appointed by persons chosen by the ratepayers. These were the main features of the measure which he asked for leave to introduce. It was not proposed to make any change in the incidence of taxation, which, as now, would be based on gross and rateable values, and it was only in the mode of ascertaining the value and assessment that alteration was proposed. Although quarter sessions would be relieved of their functions, the present magisterial element would not be dispensed with; for about one-half the members of the proposed Boards would be justices and members of quarter sessions; and with the exception of the quarter sessions and district Commissioners, it was proposed to retain existing jurisdictions. In Ireland valuations were made by a Government officer for all purposes. There was only one column and that was for the net value, which almost corresponded with our rateable value, and there was a Court of Appeal similar to that proposed for England. The Scotch system, less perfect than the Irish one, was vastly superior to that of England. Commissioners of Supply there made out valuation lists, or employed persons to do so; and if they employed a Government officer, the valuation served for Imperial and local purposes. This system was far preferable to the three systems employed here. It was proposed that the metropolis, owing to its special circumstances, should be exempt from this Bill; but if its principles were agreed to, they might in a future Bill be applied to the metropolis. The valuation under the proposed Bill would extend to Imperial and local taxation. It would also affect the composition of jury lists, election of guardians, licensing, and many other matters, which would make the Bill lengthy and complicated, but he hoped that it would be laid on the table in about a week, and read a second time in about three weeks. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. CHILDERS said, the Bill necessarily involved so many details that it must be in their hands before they could express their opinions upon its proposals. He was glad that it was introduced, although he looked with jealousy upon the appointment of a large number of appellate barristers.

MR. BAXTER said, that the admirable working of the Scotch system during the last thirteen years had filled Scotch Members with amazement at the continuance of the English system. The assessment in Scotland was not perfect, and it was intended to ask for amendments this Session; but the system worked admirably for taxation and registration.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, the advantage of an uniform system of valuation was unquestionable; and, therefore, such a system ought to be adopted. Such a measure failed previously in the House of Commons from the conflict of interests in regard to the matter, when public opinion was not so ripe for Reform as now. He regretted that the Bill did not establish a universal system of rating.

MR. AYRTON said, he was glad the metropolis was to be excluded from the Bill, not because he objected to the principle, but because its circumstances were different from those of the rest of the country, and the Bill would not have worked in London in the manner proposed for the counties. He hoped in any Bill for the metropolis the authorities would have full power to make investigations as to the real value of each individual property. He thought there was some obscurity as to the manner of descending from a whole parish to separate holdings.

MR. HUNT said, he thought he had explained that the assessment committees would go into the case of every holding. There need be no apprehension as to the number of barristers to be employed; it was not proposed to employ standing assessors, at fixed salaries, but to appoint them from time to time at such remuneration as might be determined upon; and if the scheme were successful, there would hardly ever be an appeal.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for a Common basis of value for the purposes of Government and Local Taxation, and to promote uniformity in the assessment of Rateable Property in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HUNT, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Mr. GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 12.]

Mr. Childers

PRINTING.—SELECT COMMITTEE. COST OF PAPERS.

On Motion for the appointment of the Sessional Printing Committee,

MR. CHILDERS said, he took the opportunity to offer the suggestion, which it would hardly be proper to make to the Committee unless it had been previously made to the House, that—as in some foreign Legislatures—the cost of printing each Return should be printed on the face of it, not so much to deter hon. Members from calling for Returns as to show them at what cost they were produced, and to lead them to inquire whether the information desired was not otherwise accessible. Hon. Members were hardly aware of the great cost of printing, and that a large amount of that cost was incurred unnecessarily.

MR. HUNT said, that the question of the cost of printing Returns had already occupied the consideration of the Government. No doubt it was quite possible to ascertain the cost of printing these Returns. The difficulty was to ascertain the cost of compiling them. If the House would require that whenever a Member was anxious to have a Return, or copies of Correspondence, he should give notice of the object he had in view and the points he wished to bring out, means might possibly be found to give him the information he wanted within shorter compass and in a more convenient form than at present. It frequently happened that Members moved for most elaborate statistical Returns, and it was afterwards found that the greater part of the information already existed in the Library, in Returns already laid before the House. If the suggestion now made were adopted, his notion was that they might dispense with three-fourths of the papers which now overburdened their shelves, and which Members hardly knew how to get rid of at the end of a Session. The suggestion of his hon. Friend should not be lost sight of.

Select Committee appointed and nominated, "to assist Mr. Speaker in all matters which relate to the Printing executed by Order of this House, and for the purpose of selecting and arranging for Printing, Returns and Papers presented in pursuance of Motions made by Members of this House:"—MR. BONHAM-CARTER, SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, MR. SECRETARY WALPOLE, MR. HENLEY, MR. CARDWELL, MR. GASKELL, SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, THE O'CONNOR DON, MR. HASTINGS RUSSELL, MR. CHILDERS, and MR. THE LORD CHIEF BARON.*

PETITION OF RIGBY WASON, ESQUIRE.

tion complaining of the Conduct in 1835 of the Lord Chief Baron, then Mr. Kelly, and praying for Inquiry; of Rigby Wason, of Corwar, in the County of Ayr, Esquire, said: My Lords, I have a Petition to present upon a matter of considerable importance. It is from Mr. Rigby Wason

[*The report of the debate on this Petition has been necessarily restricted to those parts of it which relate immediately to the allegations of the Petition.

The law of Parliament considers any publication of its proceedings to be breach of privilege, and therefore gives no protection to any report, however faithful; Lord Campbell's Act does not extend its very limited protection to cases arising from such reports; and success against proceedings in an action at law is only in degree less disastrous than an adverse result. Everything, therefore, to which exception might be taken has been excluded from the report.

In the Session of 1857 Lord Campbell, adverting to the recent case of "*Davidson
v. Duncan*," said—

"When I had the honour to propose in this House a Bill which afterwards became law (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), and which effected a most material improvement in the Law of Libel, I submitted a clause very limited in its nature—for I was afraid against Sir FitzRoy Kelly, and he prays your Lordships to appoint a Committee to investigate the charges made in this Petition; and if the Committee should find these charges to be proved, then he prays that your Lordships will concur with the other House of Parliament in praying the Crown to remove the Lord Chief Baron from his high post. The allegation of the Petition is that in the year 1835 Mr.

Kelly, being then in practice at the Bar, pledged his honour as a gentleman to the truth of a statement for the purpose of deceiving a Committee of the House of Commons. The Petition alleges that the Committee was thereby deceived, and, being an Election Committee, reported that Mr. Kelly, who had been a candidate for the representation of the borough of Ipswich, had not been guilty of bribery, and had not committed any illegal practices.
Mr. Rigby Wason, however, alleges that on further inquiry the Committee came to a different opinion, and were convinced that the statement made by Mr. Kelly was unfounded, and thereupon unseated Mr.
Kelly on the ground that he had committed bribery by his friends and agents. The Petitioner goes on to state that in 1845
Mr. Kelly was appointed Solicitor General by the Government of Sir Robert Peel; that Sir Robert Peel was in some measure deceived as to the facts relating to this inquiry before the Election Committee; but that he (Mr. Rigby Wason), having to go very far—providing that any bond fide account of the proceedings of either House of Parliament should be privileged, and not subject to an action. . I was unable to carry it; there was a majority against me, because it was said, not only that the law gave no such privilege, but that it ought not to be given."

In the same year Lord Campbell obtained the appointment of a Select Committee on the "Privilege of Reports," before which
Mr. Dobie, the solicitor of The Times,
Mr. Baines of The Leeds Mercury, Mr.
Hargrove of The York Herald, and Mr.
Hansard, gave evidence. The Committee reported in favour of extending protection to faithful reports of proceedings in Parliament, "the majority being influenced by the evidence of Mr. Hansard, and of the solicitor to The Times newspaper." In the following Session, Lord Campbell introduced a Bill to give effect to the Report of the Committee. The Bill contained the following clause:—

no personal enmity to Mr. Kelly, did not think it right to go into the case against him. Mr. Kelly was afterwards appointed to the office of Attorney General; and again to the same office under Lord Derby's Government in 1852; and finally attained, under the present Government, the office which he now fills. The Petition concludes with the prayer which I have already detailed. My Lords, I have felt it my duty to present this Petition, relating, as it does, to a public matter of the highest importance. But there are some reasons in the Petition itself which certainly make me feel it not my duty—whatever course other noble Lords may think it right to adopt—to ask your Lordships to assent in this case to the appointment of the Committee which is asked for. In the first place, I cannot agree with the allegation of Mr. Rigby Wason that when Sir FitzRoy Kelly was appointed Solicitor General by Sir Robert Peel it was not a matter of great public importance, or that if Sir Robert Peel had been deceived it was not a question in which Mr. Wason ought to feel any interest. Now, in the first place, a gentleman of the Bar who is appointed Solicitor General is in the direct road to promotion to the office of a Judge, and it would be a great injustice to the public to appoint any man to be Solicitor General who had notoriously been guilty of pledging his honour as a gentleman to the truth of that which he knew to be false; and, therefore, if there had been ground for charging such an offence against Sir FitzRoy Kelly, it was Mr. Rigby Wason's duty to have brought the matter before Sir Robert Peel. Nobody can believe that Sir Robert Peel would have thought lightly of such a charge, or would have appointed Sir FitzRoy Kelly Solicitor General without any contradiction of the charge so made against him. It appears to me, first, that Sir Robert Peel having appointed Sir FitzRoy Kelly to be Solicitor General was satisfied of his integrity and his fitness for the office, and that he should be advanced in the usual manner. In the next place, it appears to me that Mr. Rigby Wason could hardly have refrained from pressing his charges from any feeling of personal tenderness for Sir FitzRoy Kelly, but rather because he felt that his proofs were insufficient. But I have had further information upon the subject since I came to that decision. Mr. Rigby Wason sent me copies of letters which he had written to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), and to Mr. Walpole, the Home Secretary, bringing these charges, and I have also received the answer sent from Sir FitzRoy Kelly to Mr. Walpole, stating that he would send an answer more in detail on a future day; but, meanwhile, totally denying the truth of these allegations. I have since seen a statement under the hand of Sir FitzRoy Kelly himself, in which he not only denies the truth of these allegation, or indictment for libel, in respect or on account of any faithful report of proceedings at any sitting of either House of Parliament, at which strangers have been permitted to be present."

In his speech in moving the Second Reading, after a full exposition of the law on the publication of reports of proceedings in Parliament, Lord Campbell said—

"Mr. Hansard, a name well known to their Lordships, after stating that he had not had actions brought, but had been in constant dread of them, gave this evidence:

"Your Lordships are very well aware that my publication is the only publication which professes to record the proceedings of Parliament in extenso, and with very considerate fidelity, but that I am not in any way recognized—that I have no protection whatever more than any other person who should publish in extenso or otherwise any reports of debates in your Lordships' House or of debates in the other House. Now, the consequence of the present state of the Law of Libel is this: that if matter is uttered in debate in either House which would be libellous and would be unprotected if published out of the House, I am obliged to consider whether it would be safe for me to print that matter; and if I am clearly of opinion that it would not be safe for me to do so, inasmuch as the publication is not of such a nature that I could stand the expenses of a prosecution, the result is that I strike the matter out without any attempt at modification or otherwise.

"That apprehension induces you to suppress that which ought to appear if the report were fully accurate? It is, advisedly and systematically so."

Lord Wensleydale opposed the Bill, and moved its rejection; and after an instructive debate, in which the present Lord Chancellor (who at that time also held the Great Seal) spoke strongly against the measure, the Amendment was carried by a majority of 35 to 7, and the Bill was thrown out.

Under such a state of the law, and such being the declared opinion of Parliament on the subject, and considering that the vindication of the Lord Chief Baron's character was the essential part of the discussion, Mr. Hansard holds it within his discretion to restrict his report to that point.]

tions, but enters into explanations for the purpose of showing how totally unfounded they are. In the first place, he states—what Mr. Rigby Wason does not state—that the particular charge in which he is accused of having stated what was false was founded on a statement which Mr. Rigby Wason alleges Sir FitzRoy Kelly to have made, that he was not acquainted personally with a Mr. Pilgrim, and knew nothing whatever of him. Sir FitzRoy Kelly says that he never made such a statement, for it was notorious that he knew Pilgrim, who was clerk in the office of a solicitor at Ipswich. He further says that by accident Mr. Gurney, the shorthand writer, had kept his notes of that speech, and that the notes contained no such statements as those embodied in the allegations. The truth of that charge being thus denied, Sir FitzRoy Kelly proceeds to say that, so far from Sir Robert Peel having any difficulty or doubt about appointing him, he was afterwards appointed under another Government to the same office. The Election Committee which, as I have already stated, reported that Sir FitzRoy Kelly had been guilty of bribery, could not have found that he was personally cognizant of bribery, for they reported that it was committed through his friends and agents. It therefore appears to me that the allegations fall to the ground. It seems to me impossible that since 1835, now nearly thirty-two years ago, Sir FitzRoy Kelly could have been a candidate for Ipswich, afterwards a candidate and Member for Cambridge, and finally Member for Suffolk—having been elected, I believe, six times for that county—without these circumstances being brought to light. It seems to me quite impossible—the speech having been taken in shorthand—that some of his constituents or opponents would not have brought the matter forward during the excitement that usually takes place during a General Election. For these reasons, though I have thought it right to present the Petition, as I have already stated, I do not support its prayer or intend to found any Motion upon it.

LORD ST. LEONARDS having requested that the prayer of the Petition might be read by the Clerk at the table, the Clerk read as follows:—

“Your Petitioner therefore prays your right honourable House to appoint a Committee to inquire into the distinct Charge which has been made; and that if such Committee find that Sir Fitzroy Kelly has been guilty of that with which he has been charged, then that your right honourable House will join the other House of Parliament in moving an Address to the Queen, praying that Sir Fitzroy Kelly may be relieved from his judicial position.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl (Earl Russell) was good enough to give me a copy of the Petition which he has presented for the purpose of sending it to my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chief Baron; and I have received from him information which I trust will enable me to answer the Petition fully and satisfactorily. My Lords, I think the noble Earl might have been excused if he had declined to present a Petition of this character; and certainly the course he has taken is one of an unusual description, for he has adopted the unusual course of reading through every part of it, and has, as he proceeded, given a refutation of every charge contained in it; I cannot help thinking, then, that it would have better become the noble Earl if he had, under the circumstances, declined to take charge of the Petition. I know an impression prevails that if a petition is couched in respectful terms to the House, no Member ought to refuse to present it; but ever since I have had the honour of a seat in your Lordships' House I have ventured to act upon a different principle, and I have exercised a discretion with reference to petitions which have been intrusted to me. I have no doubt that the noble Earl was acting from a different impression as to the duty of a Member of this House; and I am quite sure I do him no less than justice when I say that he was not very well pleased with the task which his sense of duty compelled him to undertake. Now, my Lords, assuming every word of this Petition to be true, we must not forget that the facts upon which these most grave charges against the Lord Chief Baron are founded took place no less than thirty-two years ago, and that during that long period my right hon. and learned Friend has twice held the office of Solicitor General, and once that of Attorney General—and the noble Earl was perfectly right in saying that these offices are generally looked upon as giving a sort of inchoate right to the highest seat upon the judicial bench—my right hon. and learned Friend has also stood election tests; he has represented the county of Suffolk, I think, in three different Parliaments, and your Lordships will very well believe that if there should be any moral stain upon the character of a candidate for Parliamentary honours it is likely to be drawn out in the heat of a contested election. Your Lordships may naturally wonder why Mr. Rigby Wason has kept silence so long, and why he has chosen to speak at last. This he explains, or endeavours to explain, in his Petition. He says that at the time my right hon. and learned Friend was appointed Solicitor General he was applied to by Sir Robert Peel to give information as to "the facts respecting the conduct of Mr. Kelly, but he declined to do so on the ground that he had no personal feeling in the matter, and that Mr. Kelly could not inflict greater injury upon the public as Solicitor General than he could as a Barrister in full practice."

The noble Earl forestalled me in the answer to this statement when he remarked that there was a very material difference between a barrister in ordinary practice and a person of that description being selected by favour of the Crown and placed at the head of the profession, having thus as it were a passport to the judicial bench. The Petitioner says the reason he has now ceased to be silent upon the subject is—

"That your Petitioner submits to your right honourable House that the appointment of a Judge should be governed by very different principles from those which might excuse the appointment of Solicitor or Attorney General; and that the precedent held out to the Bar, that wilful and deliberate Falsehood should be no bar to attaining the position of a Judge, must be fraught with the most disastrous consequences not only to the character of the Bar but to Society."

I regret, my Lords, that I am obliged to enter into matters of this description; but it is absolutely necessary in order to explain some of the statements of the Petition. In 1837, then, Mr. Kelly was a candidate for the representation of the borough of Ipswich, and one of the results of that candidature was that Mr. Rigby Wason publicly charged him with deliberate falsehood before a Committee of the House of Commons. The laws of honour, as they are called, which prevailed at that time, prevented a man from sitting tamely under an imputation of this description, and compelled him to attempt to vindicate his honour by washing out the affront by the blood of his libeller. Few men were then able to brave the public scorn which attended any attempt to disregard this evil custom, and your Lordships will look probably with some forbearance on the conduct of my right hon. Friend in having demanded what is called "satisfaction" from

The Lord Chancellor

Mr. Rigby Wason. Mr. Rigby Wason refused the meeting proposed by Mr. Kelly; and on a consequent proceeding of the latter, he applied for a criminal information against my right hon. Friend for endeavouring to provoke him to fight a duel. This information failed, on grounds which I shall presently explain. This being the ground of the feeling of the Petitioner towards Mr. Kelly, I have heard it said by some, "Why not treat such charges as this with profound contempt?" But, unfortunately, a person charged in this House in this way cannot afford to do so, because the public will believe that such charges remained unanswered only because they were unanswerable; therefore, I must ask your Lordships to allow me to go through the charges contained in this Petition as briefly as I can. The first charge is—

"That Sir Fitzroy Kelly, then Mr. Kelly, having been eleven years at the Bar, and being a Queen's Counsel, did, upon the 11th of April, 1835, pledge his Honor as a Gentleman to the truth of that which he knew to be false, for the purpose of deceiving a Committee of the House of Commons."

This charge is couched in the most vague and general terms, and therefore only admits of a general denial; but, fortunately, an interpretation has been given to it in the letters to which the noble Earl alluded as having been sent to my noble Friend at the head of the Government, and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. In the letter to my noble Friend Mr. Wason says—

"Sir Fitzroy Kelly was returned to Parliament in 1834 with Mr. Dundas. A petition was presented by electors of Ipswich, but supported by my colleague and myself, and our senior counsel opened several distinct charges of bribery; among others, one of the most important as affecting agency was committed by Mr. Pilgrim. In reply, Mr. Kelly assured the Committee, upon his honour as a gentleman, that he had never heard of any person of the name of Pilgrim, and actually charged us with having invented the story, which, he said, was almost proved by the very name we had selected."

Mr. Wason then goes on to say in his Petition—

"That such judicial tribunal was deceived by such assertions of Mr. Kelly's, and he received the Fruits of his falsehood by the Committee deciding 'That no illegal act had been established against Mr. Kelly and his Colleague.' That the Committee then adjourned until the middle of May, when it met, and proceeded with the Scrutiny, which was interrupted by the Petitioners producing distinct evidence proving beyond all doubt that the assertions made by Mr. Kelly were false. That the Committee, therefore, not only rescinded the above Resolution, but resolved that Mr. Kelly and his Colleague were, by their Friends and Agents, guilty of Bribery and Corruption, and that the opposition to the Petition was frivolous and vexatious."

I will satisfy your Lordships that this statement was utterly incorrect. In 1834 Mr. Kelly was returned with Mr. Dundas, for Ipswich, and a petition, on the ground of bribery, was presented against their return. One of the charges was that one of the voters had been promised £20 by a man named Pilgrim, and that the money had subsequently been paid by that person. When the case arrived at the point where it was necessary to sum up on behalf of the sitting Members, the counsel were all absent, and my right hon. Friend was obliged to take the duty upon himself. It is untrue that in doing so he denied all knowledge of Mr. Pilgrim. On the contrary, he referred to him as a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Sewell and Blake, solicitors of Ipswich, with whom he had frequently been in communication, and from whom he had received many briefs. What he contended was, that there was no evidence of agency, and that, consequently, there was no evidence against the sitting Members. The Committee having come to that conclusion then adjourned for a considerable time for a scrutiny. Soon after Pilgrim went over to the enemy's camp and appeared, and not only proved the act of bribery to which I have referred, but also proved his own agency in the matter. Of course, under these circumstances, the Committee had no other course open but to rescind the Resolution at which they had arrived. Now, it may be asked, how do I prove that what my right hon. Friend said was not false, as is asserted by Mr. Wason? Mr. Wason asserts that my right hon. Friend denied all knowledge of Mr. Pilgrim. It is very hard to prove a negative; but it happens, fortunately, that there were notes taken of my right hon. Friend's speech by a shorthand writer, and from the beginning to the end of that speech, which has been carefully searched through, not only by my right hon. Friend, but by another gentleman, a barrister of reputation, there will be found no passage to sustain this charge. My right hon. Friend in a letter to Mr. Walpole, and referring to this speech, says:

"I have carefully looked through it from the beginning to end, and there is not one word to be found in it having the semblance of a declaration on honour, or an assertion, or a suggestion that Mr. Pilgrim was unknown to me, or that no such person existed."

Mr. Phillpotts, the barrister to whom I have alluded, writes as follows:—

ing the consultation of the late Solicitor General's chambers, I carefully read your speech of the 11th and 13th of April, 1835, referred to by Mr. Wason in his proposed Petition to the House of Commons, and can confidently say that there is not in that speech any such declaration as Mr. Wason alleges; nor any assertion or suggestion that you did not know Mr. Pilgrim; nor a sentence that can be distorted into meaning anything of the kind. Indeed, certain passages in the speech appear wholly inconsistent with any such declaration.—Believe me, yours sincerely, W. F. PHILLPOTTS."

There is another circumstance which I will mention to your Lordships as bearing out my statement. According to this statement made by Mr. Wason, Sir FitzRoy Kelly had been detected in the most discreditable falsehood it is possible for a man to utter, and this offence had been committed in the face of the Committee and in the presence of the opposing counsel. When the Committee re-assembled my right hon. Friend appeared as before, and summed up the case for the sitting Members as he had previously done. There was no disgust or indignation exhibited on that occasion by any Member of the Committee, nor did the opposing counsel suggest in any way that anything had occurred to render him unworthy of credit or in the slightest degree to disparage his testimony. Now, my Lords, let me pass to the second charge. That second charge is conveyed in the following words:—

"That your Petitioner humbly submits to your right honourable House that the conduct of which Mr. Kelly was guilty was precisely the same, morally speaking, as wilful and deliberate perjury to benefit himself, as stated by the late Lord Chief Justice Denman, who rebuked Mr. Kelly's Counsel by remarking, in an indignant manner, 'Do not go on this way, Mr. Attorney; this Court knows no distinction between what a man swears and what he says upon his honour as a Gentleman.'"

I am, fortunately, very easily able to explain this matter. At the election of 1837 to which I have already alluded, Mr. Wason stated that my right hon. Friend, before a Committee of the House of Commons, had called God to witness that he had nothing to do with the absconding of Mr. Pilgrim to avoid the Speaker's warrant. The observation of Lord Denman referred to the criminal information which Mr. Wason had filed against my right hon. Friend. In the affidavit Mr. Wason did not state, as he had stated at the hustings, that my right hon. Friend had called God to witness; but merely that he had asserted on his honour that he was no party to the absconding of Pilgrim. The affidavit of my right hon. Friend denies that he employed either of the expressions, though he contended that if he had said either it would have been perfectly true. The Attorney General who was counsel for my right hon. Friend on that occasion, referred to the discrepancy between the assertion of Mr. Wason in the affidavit and on the hustings drawing a distinction between a mere assertion and a statement upon oath. Lord Denman, with an indignation which burst forth whenever he had any idea there was an intention of confounding moral distinctions, said—

“That whatever a gentleman professes to declare, appealing to his own knowledge on the subject, must be taken to have been as solemnly made as if any obligation or any form of words had been appended to it.”

But in delivering judgment, Lord Denman expressed his opinion that there was no proof that my right hon. Friend had made use of the expression attributed to him by Mr. Wason—he said that Mr. Wason would not attempt to prove it, and would not pledge his oath to that belief. Under these circumstances, the criminal information fell to the ground. And now, my Lords, I come to the third charge, which is made in the following terms:—

“That your Petitioner has been informed and believes that the late Sir Robert Peel, ten years afterwards, positively refused to appoint Mr. Kelly as his Solicitor General, upon account of his conduct before the Ipswich Election Committee; and that the Right Hon. Gentleman’s legitimate scruples were overcome by a fraud.”

Now, this charge amounts to this—that on Sir Robert Peel hesitating to appoint my right hon. Friend as his Solicitor General his scruples were removed by his having palmed off upon him the evidence given before the Committee, which was published in the blue book, and which did not, of course, contain my right hon. Friend’s speech, in which this remark complained of was said to have occurred. Now, it so happens that I am personally able to contradict this charge. I was Solicitor General on the 28th of June, 1845, when the death of my lamented and very dear friend Sir William Follett, the Attorney General, occurred. The funeral took place on the 4th of July, and immediately after the funeral I attended Sir Robert Peel by appointment at Whitehall. He informed me that I was to be made Attorney General. I said, “Who is to be my Solicitor?” He said “Kelly;” and my right hon. Friend has the notification of his appointment to the Solicitor Generalship on that very day now in his possession. Some little correspondence, of which I was not aware until it was communicated to me by my right hon. Friend, had passed between my right hon. Friend and Sir Robert Peel in the interval elapsing between the death of Sir William Follett and my right hon. Friend’s appointment. About that time a question of privilege was under discussion, and my right hon. Friend was not so strong an assertor of the privileges of the House of Commons as Sir Robert Peel, and this occasioned a correspondence; and this was the occasion of the delay—if there was any delay—and not any unfavourable rumours against the character of my right hon. Friend. I will not apologize for trespassing thus much upon your Lordships’ attention, because the question is one of the utmost importance. If my right hon. Friend had been guilty of the conduct attributed to him in this Petition he would not attempt to defend himself by saying that there ought to be a limitation to charges of this description; and I should certainly agree in the opinion that a person who is contaminated by such scandalous conduct as has been attributed to my right hon. Friend is utterly unworthy of being raised to the judicial bench. The noble and learned Lord concluded by asserting that he had fully confuted the charges of the Petition against the Lord Chief Baron.

LORD ST. LEONARDS: My Lords, I am unwilling to occupy your Lordships’ time further; but I feel myself bound to make an appeal to the noble Earl to withdraw the Petition. The noble Earl must be aware what is the constitutional mode of proceeding against a Judge who is considered unfit to occupy his seat on the judicial bench. In the first place, it is necessary that there should be a direct inquiry into the charges at the Bar of your Lordships’ House and at the Bar of the other House; that Committees should be appointed by each to further inquire into the matter; and that there should be an agreement between both Houses to present an Address to the Crown praying that the Judge should be removed from the judgment seat. It is impossible that there can be a question of deeper interest to the entire country than such an inquiry. One great element in the happiness and the glory of this country is the upright character of the Judges who administer justice. Does the noble Earl believe for a moment that if the Petition is permitted to lie upon the table of the House, answered as it can only be at present by the denial of its truth, it is possible for the Lord Chief Baron of England to sit for another hour upon the judgment seat of the Exchequer? Can he remain there until the proper steps have been taken to investigate the truth or falsehood of the charges which have been brought against him? How can he sit to administer justice with charges of this sort hanging over him—charges which, if true, would render him utterly unfit to sit in the society of gentlemen? What would become of justice when so administered? It is very difficult in ordinary cases to make a defeated suitor believe that the judgment against him is just, even where the character, honour, and integrity of the Judge is untainted; but what would be the effect upon such a man's mind when the character of the Judge pronouncing the judgment has been brought before your Lordships' House, on allegations such as those contained in the Petition presented by the noble Earl? The noble Earl has more than once been Prime Minister in this country, and no person is better versed than himself in the steps that he is bound to take should he insist upon the Petition laying upon the table of the House. I utterly deny that it is possible for him to lay that document upon the table, and then to withdraw from further interference in the matter, and leave the whole responsibility upon your Lordships. I trust that if the noble Earl is impressed, as he says he is—and therefore I am bound to believe that to be the case—with the truth of the Lord Chief Baron's denial of the charges brought against him, he will handsomely withdraw the Petition, and will not suffer it to remain on the table of the House. It cannot remain there without further steps being taken; and if it be not withdrawn it is utterly impossible that the Lord Chief Baron, with such terrible imputations upon his character, can continue to discharge his duties as the chief of the Court of Exchequer. Upon the charge itself I shall not dwell five minutes. In the first place, what does it amount to? It appears that there was a contested election, and unhappily the principal counsel of the then Mr. Kelly, being unable to attend on his behalf before the Committee of the House, the right hon. Gentleman was induced at the last moment to address the Committee on his own behalf—a most unwise step undoubtedly—and in that double capacity of both Member whose seat was being contested, and of counsel, he is said to have made a statement which was false to his knowledge. It is admitted that if the right hon. Gentleman made the statement, he must have made it knowing it to be false, because he had been for years perfectly acquainted with the person in question. Is there any evidence in support of the charge that he denied on that occasion all knowledge of this person? Not the slightest evidence exists which can in any way substantiate the statement contained in the Petition. The note taken by our own shorthand writer in Committee does not contain a single syllable in support of the charge. Who, then, is the only other witness? Why, the Petitioner himself—a person in hostility to the right hon. Gentleman upon the particular question before the Committee. But he makes other statements in his Petition. He states that when Sir Robert Peel wished to make the right hon. Gentleman Solicitor General, he hesitated to do so on account of the right hon. Gentleman's bad character in reference to this very question, but that he was induced to give him the appointment in consequence of the entreaties of Lord Lowther, now the Earl of Lonsdale. The Earl of Lonsdale has been spoken to upon the subject, and he utterly denies that any such communication passed between himself and Sir Robert Peel on this subject, or that he had any part whatever in the advancement of the right hon. Gentleman. Can your Lordships believe that a gentleman of position at the Bar and a Member of the other House of Parliament would so far forget his honour and his feeling as a gentleman as to pledge himself to a fact that he knew to be false? This attack was first made in 1835, and from that moment down to the present the right hon. Gentleman has been continually before the public, he has stood several contested elections, and has been returned six times consecutively Member for his county without a single word in reference to this matter being breathed against him. My Lords, I call on the noble Earl opposite to consider what a bad precedent has been made in this case; for where is the man whose character would be safe if, on the ground of some speech or conversation two or three and thirty years ago, such a charge is to be brought against him, the object of which is to remove him with ignominy from the high office he may have attained? Solemnly and seriously, I ask the noble Earl before the world to consider the terrible consequences of the step he has been induced to take. I ask him whether, in justice to my right hon. and learned Friend, he does not consider it his duty to withdraw this Petition?

EARL RUSSELL: I hope your Lordships will permit me to refer again to the course I thought it my duty to take with regard to this Petition. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has given his opinion that it would be better if on occasions of this kind no petition should be presented. Now, I quite agree with the noble and learned Lord that in a matter of private concern, without any public object apparent, it would not be right to present a petition of this kind to your Lordships; but this is the case of a petition signed by a subject of Her Majesty, asking Her Majesty for a remedy which is pointed out by the Constitution—namely, that a certain charge being made and proved, your Lordships should address the Crown to remove the Judge. I own it appeared to me that if petitions of that sort were refused by every Member of your Lordships' House, far more injury would be done than could result from their presentation and discussion, and that every kind of publicity would be given to the charges by publication in the newspapers without the opportunity of refutation. In the first place, there would be the appearance of shutting the doors of this House against the petitions of the Queen's subjects; in the next place, the charges would be repeated in the newspapers and pamphlets, and without the same opportunity to the party charged of answering them. My Lords, I did what I considered to be my duty; I took a copy of the Petition to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. I stated that I looked to him as head of the law, and I asked him to have the goodness to communicate to the Lord Chief Baron the contents of the Petition. I did this, that when the Petition was presented there might be a full opportunity of an answer to the charges which it contained. That opportunity the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has fully and properly availed himself of. He has given a complete answer to all the charges made. It appears to me a matter of the greatest public importance that the character of our Judges should remain, as I am happy to think they have hitherto been, unstained and pure in the eyes of the public; and I do confess that it appears to me, my Lords, better that before an assembly such as your Lordships, such charges should be heard and refuted, than that they should be suppressed, and that every Peer should refuse to listen to a petitioner, and that a person aggrieved should not have the opportunity of saying that he was not even allowed a hearing in the House of Lords. That was the view I took of this matter; and I own I still think on an occasion of this kind, where great constitutional questions are concerned, that publicity and debate, either in this or the other House of Parliament, does tend to the public welfare. With regard to the request which the noble and learned Lord who last addressed your Lordships (Lord St. Leonards) has made, I am not versed in the proceedings of your Lordships' House with respect to petitions of this kind, whether they should be allowed to lie on the table or be withdrawn. I am free to declare, for my part, that I am ready to withdraw the Petition. I would refer the matter to the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury, who is well versed in the proceedings of the House. If he declares that it is in conformity with the usual course of proceeding to withdraw the Petition, I am quite ready to take that course. I am fully satisfied that the character of the eminent Judge, so far as it is impugned in the Petition, remains unstained; and that the subjects of Her Majesty may have full confidence in the administration of justice by that very eminent man, not only from his knowledge of the law and great learning, but also his high personal character.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, as the noble Earl has referred to me, I will say without the slightest hesitation that if I had been led inadvertently to present such a petition, I certainly should feel it my duty to withdraw it after the discussion which has taken place; and for this reason, that if you present a petition and move that it lie on the table, you express an opinion as to the merits of the case. But after the discussion which has taken place, after the crushing refutation of every single point, and the complete and entire vindication of the right hon. and learned person who was attacked, I do think the House of Lords is bound to go a little further than expressing no opinion about it. After the debate and refutation we shall only be doing our duty and supporting our own dignity and character by refusing to allow this Petition to lie on the table. I will not question the taste and judgment of the noble Earl in bringing it forward; but, having brought it forward, and having heard it refuted entirely to his own satisfaction, I think that his plain and obvious course is to withdraw the Petition.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The proper course will be to put the Question to the House—That the Petition do lie on the table? The Not-Contents have it.

APPREHENDED DISTURBANCES AT CHESTER.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: I wish to put a question to the noble Earl respecting certain events which have just taken place at Chester. It appears that an inroad of some 1,500 Fenians has taken place, with the intention of attacking the Castle and possessing themselves of the arms stored there, and that there being very few troops to protect the city, it has been found necessary to send down by train a regiment of the Fusileer Guards. I would ask the noble Earl, Whether he has received to-day any accounts from Chester, and what was the state of the town?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I believe I can give the noble Lord little more information than has appeared in all the public papers. The facts are shortly these:—On Sunday morning my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department received an intimation from Liverpool that considerable excitement prevailed in that town caused by an extraordinary influx of strangers from Manchester, Staley-bridge, Preston, Halifax, and other quarters, none of them appearing to have any business to do, and all of them having a very suspicious aspect. In the course of the afternoon of Sunday information had been received that the object of these men was to go on the following morning to Chester and endeavour to take possession of the arms stored in the Castle. In consequence of this information, the chief constable of Liverpool thought it necessary to send over an officer to Chester to apprise the authorities. It was late when he got there; but having called up the functionaries, he suggested that immediate steps should be taken; and next morning the proceedings were telegraphed to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He thought it right to communicate at once with General Garrook, commanding the district, and with the Mayor of Chester, putting them in communication with each other, and authorizing the Mayor, if he thought it necessary, to send for an additional company of the 54th Regiment, from Preston. In the course of the day the number of these persons in Chester had largely increased. There were 1,500 or 1,600 who were described as Fenians, and apparently bent on the design attributed to them. The Mayor, therefore, requested authority to send for further troops from Manchester or Preston. Thereupon, my right hon. Friend communicated with the War Office and the Commander-in-Chief, and it was agreed between them that it was not desirable to weaken the small force at Preston and Manchester, on which the safety of Liverpool depended, there being not a single soldier there—consequently, if other troops were required it would be desirable to send down a battalion of Guards from London. That was communicated by telegraph to the Mayor between nine and ten o'clock, with the request that if more troops were considered necessary to telegraph back again and a battalion of Guards would be ready to be sent down. In the meantime directions were given that 500 men should be kept in readiness to start on a moment's notice. At one o'clock a telegram was received from the Mayor urgently desiring that the Guards should be sent down; and they were sent down at two o'clock this morning, and must have reached Chester at an early hour this morning. I requested my right hon. Friend to let me know the latest accounts; but when I came to the House he had not received any further intelligence. A private telegram, however, had been received by Lord Elcho from Lord Grosvenor, which reported that the matter had been serious, and that the town had been saved by the promptitude of the measures which had been taken.

TRAFFIC REGULATION (METROPOLIS)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the necessity for legislation on this subject was shown by a Return which showed the number of persons killed and injured by being run over in the streets of London during the year 1865. In that portion of the town which fell under the supervision of the Metropolitan Police, the number of persons killed from the cause he had mentioned since January, 1865, to March, 1866, was 163; and in the City the number killed between the 1st of January, 1865, and the 26th of February, 1866, was 17. The number injured in the London Metropolitan Police district was 1,938, and in the City 237. The Bill applied to all parts of London, including the City, within a radius of four miles from Charing Cross. The Bill necessarily consisted in a great degree of matters of detail, the principal of which he would mention to their Lordships. The first clause after the interpretation clauses prohibited, under a penalty of 40s., the removal of ashes, dust, or refuse from any house, or the sweeping of streets—except the removal of snow—between the hours of ten o'clock in the morning and seven in the evening. By the next clause it was provided that no coal, or casks, whether empty or full, should be loaded or unloaded on or across any footway within the metropolis—which as defined by the Bill meant the City of London and all parishes and places within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works—except between the hours of one o'clock and ten in the morning, or in such back streets or other byways as might be approved by the Commissioners of Police; that no goods or other articles should be allowed to rest on any footway or other part of a street for a longer time than might be absolutely necessary for loading or unloading. As he had reason to believe that there would be a good deal of opposition to this clause, he pointed out that the public had an absolute right to the user of the foot pavement; and that although these provisions might cause a certain amount of inconvenience to individual interests, yet it was not unreasonable that those interests should give way to the general public good. It was likewise proposed by the Bill to prevent the driving of cattle through the streets between the hours of ten in the morning and seven in the evening without a licence from the Commissioners of Police. Another clause of the Bill contained a provision to prevent, without licence from the Police Commissioners, the driving along the streets carts laden with timber, iron, or other heavy goods, or with ladders, scaffolds, or poles, or other articles exceeding twenty-five feet in length, or any cart drawn by more than four horses, between the hours of ten in the morning and seven in the evening. With regard to the drivers of metropolitan stage carriages, it was provided that they should not stop to take up or set down except as near as possible to the left side of the roadway; there was a prohibition in the Bill against pictures, prints, boards, placards, or notices of any kind being carried or distributed by way of advertisement in any street by any person riding in any vehicle, or on horseback, or on foot. There were certain clauses in the measure relating to "special limits," and by these it was provided that the Commissioners of Police, subject to the sanction, in the Metropolitan Police district, of the Home Secretary, and in the City of the Home Secretary with the approval of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, might from time to time take any street or portion of any street out of the special limits of the Act, and might make regulations prohibiting any vehicles coming into such street for the purpose of only passing through, and might lay down the route for them to take. The time during which vehicles might be allowed to come into or remain in any street within the special limits for the purpose of loading and unloading was also prescribed, as well as the maximum speed at which vehicles and horses were to go, and the line to be kept by persons riding, driving, or walking. The second part of the Bill contained regulations with respect to hackney carriages. In future the driver of any hackney carriage drawn by one horse would be entitled to a fare of not less than 1s.; and he would be bound to furnish his vehicle with at least one lamp properly trimmed and lighted after sunset. He intended to propose some other clauses in Committee with a view of providing for the public the benefit of a superior kind of cab or vehicle of that description. It had been stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that the cabs of London were very bad and were getting worse, and into the hands of a more needy body of men. There were certain detailed regulations with respect to hackney carriages with which he need not trouble the House. He should next advert to those provisions of the Bill which related to the removal of snow. It was provided that the "street authority," be it the vestry or any other body, shall with all practicable speed remove the snow which falls in the streets within its jurisdiction. If the street authority neglected the performance of that duty, besides a penalty, complaint may be made by any private individual to a magistrate, and a summons may be obtained from him calling upon the offenders to appear before him; and, if satisfied of the justice of the charge, he might make an order requiring the street authority to remove the snow within a limited period—three hours, for instance—or some such reasonable time. If that order were disregarded, then the complainant might apply for a further order to remove the snow, authorizing him to employ persons for the purpose, and might, by a subsequent order to be called a pay order, recover the expenses of the work. The Bill went on to provide, with respect to dogs found straying about the streets, that they may be seized by the police and, if not claimed within three days, may be sold or destroyed; and upon complaint that any person has been bitten by any dog, the magistrate may direct the dog to be destroyed. There were besides certain miscellaneous provisions in the Bill relating to fairs, lamp-posts, and street-betting, with which he need not on that occasion trouble the House, and he would conclude by moving that it be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Belmore.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought that although some of the provisions in the Bill might be advantageously adopted for facilitating the traffic in the central and most crowded districts of the metropolis, they would operate very vexatiously if brought into general operation in the suburbs. The noble Lord was also understood to ask for information on some of the details of the clauses. A Bill, like that now before the House, full of minute details, would require much examination; and he suggested that it would be improved if it were referred in the first instance to a Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH called the attention of the House to the numerous deaths and the severe injuries to the person caused by the reckless driving of cabs and other one-horse vehicles in the metropolis; and he thought some provision, whether by way of giving the magistrates power to issue bye-laws, or in some other way, ought to be introduced into this Bill for the purpose of checking the evil of which he complained.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in reply, said, that if it was thought that the details of the measure would be better considered in a Select Committee than in the usual Committee of the Whole House, he should not object to its being so referred, though he did not at present see the necessity of adopting such a course. With respect to the alteration in the cab fares, the proposition was that no cab should be called off the stand at less than 1s., but that the hirer should be at liberty to insist on being driven two miles for that sum. He saw no reason for altering the provision with regard to the four mile radius.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH complained that the noise in their Lordships' House was so great that it was impossible to hear with any distinctness the statements of his noble Friend; but from what he could gather relative to the proposals submitted, they embraced many minute points of detail, which it would be impossible to discuss in that House, and therefore he agreed with his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley) that it would be expedient to send this Bill to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF BELMORE would not offer any further objection to that course, and would therefore consent to the Bill being now read a second time, with the view of its being so referred.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

And, on February 15, Select Committee appointed as follows:

Ld. Privy Seal	E. De Grey
Ld. Steward	E. Granville
E. Tankerville	E. Kimberley
E. Graham	L. Methuen
E. Lucan	L. Stanley of Alderley
E. Belmore	L. Houghton.

And, on February 18, The Marquess of Westmeath, The Earl of Airlie, and The Earl Stanhope added; February 19, The Lord Portman, and The Lord Ebury added.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for the Union of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the Government thereof; and for Purposes connected therewith—Was presented by The Earl of Carnarvon; read 1^a. (No. 9.)

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for amending the Law of Auctions of Estates — Was presented by The Lord St. Leonards; read 1^a. (No. 10.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, February 12, 1867.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Sir John Burgess Karslake, knight, for Andover.

SELECT COMMITTEE—On Metropolitan Local Government appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Tests Abolition (Oxford).

Ordered—Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings; Church Rates Commutation; Industrial Schools (Ireland); Tests Abolition (Oxford); Railway Debenture Holders; Land Tenure (Ireland)*; Associations of Workmen.

First Reading—Church Rates Abolition* [13]; Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings [14]; Church Rates Commutation [15]; Tests Abolition (Oxford) [16]; Industrial Schools (Ireland) [17]; Trades Unions* [18]; Land Tenure (Ireland)* [19].

RAILWAY BILLS—STANDING ORDERS. DISPOSAL OF DEPOSITS.—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN called the attention of the House to the conflict between the Standing Orders of that House and the Standing Orders of the House of Lords as to the clause to be inserted in Railway Bills regulating the disposal of the deposit, and asked the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, What course he proposed to adopt to meet this state of circumstances? The conflict in question arose in consequence of an alteration made by the House of Lords in the Standing Orders on the last day or two of the previous Session, whereby the deposits lodged by railway companies were prohibited from being withdrawn until half the capital was subscribed, and a certain portion of the proposed line had been actually constructed. Now, as this alteration was opposed to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, he was anxious to know what was to be done under the circumstances.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN, Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, said, the hon. Baronet opposite had called his attention to this subject in the last week of the last Session; but as almost all the Members who usually took part in Private Bills had then left town, he did not consider it prudent to bring this matter then before the House. The Standing Orders of the House of Commons permitted the withdrawal, under certain circumstances, of the deposit made by railway companies; but on the last day or two of the previous Session, at the instance of Lord Redesdale, an Amendment was made in the House of Lords whereby such withdrawal was impossible. This Amendment had occasioned much comment amongst all parties interested in railways. The Committee of Standing Orders were about to take the subject into their consideration, and he would be prepared to take such action in the matter as he would be advised.

MR. DODSON said, that the Amendments made in the Standing Orders of the House of Lords were of a character to contradict the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and they were also to a certain extent in contravention of the 9 Vict. c. 20, which regulates deposits. When the Standing Orders of the House of Lords were of such a nature as to direct a certain clause to be inserted in every Railway Bill, it appeared to him to be trenching upon legislation, and it was practically an attempt at legislation by a single House of Parliament. In deciding on the course it should pursue in regard to these Amendments of the Lords, the House should, and no doubt would, be guided solely by the consideration whether those Amendments were just and expedient or not. It was, however, a thing to be regretted that such Amendments should be proposed in the other House of Parliament at a period of the Session when there was no opportunity of communicating directly or indirectly with Members of this House.

METROPOLITAN CABS AND HACKNEY CARRIAGE TRADE (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the year ended the 31st day of March 1866, in which they state their opinion of the condition of the Metropolitan cabs and also the peculiar nature of the hackney carriage trade in the metropolis; and also to the evidence of Sir Richard Mayne before a Committee of the House of Commons as to the inability of the police, under the present regulations, to prevent the licensing of cabs unfit for public use; and also to the evidence of Sir John Thwaites and others, before a Committee of the House of Commons, as to the very unsatisfactory condition of the hackney carriages of the metropolis as compared with those of other cities and towns in the kingdom, and with those of other cities in Europe; and, whether he will be prepared to introduce a measure during the present Session to consolidate the various Acts relating to metropolitan hackney carriages; to revise the tariff with a view of enabling the public to have the option of obtaining a superior class of hackney carriage at an increased fare; and to take away the power at present possessed by the cab-owners of imprisoning their drivers in White Cross Street Prison in the event of their failing to pay the daily hiring?

MR. WALPOLE stated that his attention had been directed to the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the year ended the 31st of March, 1866, in which they expressed their opinion of the condition of the metropolitan cabs, and also of the peculiar nature of the hackney carriage trade in the metropolis; and also to the evidence of Sir Richard Mayne before a Committee of the House of Commons as to the inability of the police, under the present regulations, to prevent the licensing of cabs unfit for public use; and also to the evidence of Sir John Thwaites and others, before a Committee of the House of Commons, as to the very unsatisfactory condition of the hackney carriages of the metropolis as compared with those of other cities and towns in the kingdom, and with those of other cities in Europe. He believed all those statements to be substantially correct; but the Government were not prepared to introduce a general measure during the present Session to consolidate the various Acts relating to metropolitan hackney carriages. As to the tariff of fares, he wished to inform the House that his noble Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department in the other House had brought in a Bill relating to the street traffic in the metropolis, and in that Bill would be introduced clauses which it was hoped would have the effect of providing an improved class of hackney carriages. With respect to the third question, he was not prepared at present to say whether there ought to be any alteration of the law in that respect.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE then asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the year ended the 31st day of March, 1866, in which they state—

“It must be admitted that our four-wheeled cabs are a disgrace to the Metropolis of a great Empire; that the Duty is very heavy; that capital is repelled from embarking in the hackney carriage trade; and that the number of needy men who set up a single cab and drive it themselves is increasing every year, while that of the large proprietors is diminishing:”

and, whether he will be prepared to introduce a measure during the present Session for the equalization of the Duties on Metropolitan and Provincial hackney carriages, the Duty at present levied upon Metropolitan cabs being about three times that charged upon similar vehicles in any other part of the Kingdom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had read the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue with great interest, not merely with regard to the point mentioned by the worthy Alderman, but also with regard to several other matters. The worthy Alderman he was sure would not deem him guilty of any disrespect if on the present occasion he declined to give any information as to whether he was going to propose any remission or considerable alteration of the public taxes. He was sure the worthy Alderman would allow him when he had any alteration or remission to propose on such a subject to announce it himself to the House, and that he should not be asked to answer questions which, under the circumstances, would expose him to great misapprehension and lead to great inconveniences.

BRITISH TROOPS IN NEW ZEALAND. QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What is the number of British Troops still remaining in New Zealand; what force is to be left there permanently; and, by whom the expense of maintaining such force is to be borne?

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the British troops in New Zealand, already reduced from 10,000 to 3,190, are under orders to quit, except one regiment of Infantry, which this country will maintain; but, while it does so, the colony is to appropriate yearly £50,000 to native purposes. Peremptory orders had been issued to immediately send home the excess of the number over the one regiment to be kept there, and it did not appear, from the most recent accounts received from the colony, that there was any reason why those orders should not be immediately obeyed. He should present further papers in continuation of those presented at the end of last Session, which would put the House in possession of all the correspondence that had taken place on the affairs of New Zealand up to the present time.

SCURVY.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the circumstance that on the 9th instant eleven seamen were hoisted helplessly on board the Dreadnought Hospital Ship in a state of utter prostration, from the easily preventable disease of scurvy, whilst others were received the same day suffering in a less degree from the same malady; and, whether steps have been taken to ascertain the number of British seamen suffering in a greater or less degree from scurvy at the home ports, who take refuge in sailors' homes and in lodginghouses apart from the seamen's hospitals; and also at the Colonial and Consular ports, in the Indian and Pacific ports?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Yes, the attention of the Board of Trade has been directed to the case of these seamen, and an inquiry has been ordered into the circumstances. That inquiry is now taking place. I may mention that it has for some time past been the practice of the Board of Trade to direct the shipping masters of the different ports to report to them all cases of seamen landing ill of scurvy. We have, however, no special information as to the number of such seamen who take refuge in sailors' homes or in lodginghouses. In the ports, however, the case is different, and the results of the inquiries that had been made were laid before Parliament last Session. More recent papers relating to the same subject will be shortly laid upon the table. In regard to the Colonial and Consular ports we have not the same means of obtaining information. A correspondence in reference to this matter has been going on with the Indian Government, and the papers will be laid before Parliament. The Government hopes before long to be able to introduce some provisions to meet this very melancholy case, and to apply a stronger control over the causes which seem to render the disease of scurvy so prevalent.

SCOTCH BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What Scotch Bills are to be introduced by Government, and who is to take charge of Scotch business in the House of Commons, the Lord Advocate not having a seat?

MR. WALPOLE: I have just had some correspondence with the Lord Advocate upon this subject; but, as he is not now in London, and as no definite arrangement has been made, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will have no objection to put his Question again on Friday, when I hope I shall be able to give him a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy

RATING AND RENTALS.

QUESTION.

MR. BASS asked the President of the Poor Law Board, When the Returns as to Rating and Rentals ordered by the House on the 28th day of June will be presented?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In consequence of a letter the hon. Gentleman addressed to me yesterday, I have made inquiry on the subject, and I find that the Poor Law Officers state they are not in possession of materials necessary to enable them to furnish the Returns. The few Returns which have come in are so imperfect in many respects that they are of no use whatever.

APPREHENDED DISTURBANCES AT CHESTER.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH: I wish to put a Question with reference to a statement in the morning newspapers that 800 persons in the course of yesterday took possession of Chester Castle. That the alarm was so great that the inhabitants were sworn in as special constables, and that that alarm extended to Her Majesty's Government, a regiment of Guards having been sent down last night by special train. Will the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department let us know what truth there is in these statements, and what reason there is for supposing the movement to be a Fenian one? I am informed that the gathering was really nothing but a collection of roughs to witness a prize fight that was coming off in the neighbourhood.

MR. WALPOLE: Perhaps the best answer I can give to the Question of the hon. Gentleman will be to state, in as simple a narrative as I can, all the circumstances leading to the inquiry he has made of the Government. On Sunday morning last I received a communication stating that there was unusual excitement among those who are generally acknowledged, or, at any rate, believed to be Fenians in the town of Liverpool. It was stated that they were meeting together with unusual frequency, and that there was some apprehension that a movement was about to be made on their part. In consequence of that information, on Sunday afternoon I sent down a person specially to inquire into the truth of those statements which had been communicated to me, and to report as soon as possible what information he could obtain for the Government. Soon after I had reached the Home Office on Monday morning a telegraphic message came from the Mayor of Chester, stating that a large number of strangers were in the town and neighbourhood; that they were believed to be Fenians; and that the apprehension was they were about to attack the Castle, for the purpose of obtaining the arms and ammunition stored there; and the telegram also stated the numbers of troops there were in the town, and expressed a wish that an additional force should be sent down. Upon that information being conveyed to the Home Office, I directed that a company of troops should be sent from Manchester to Chester, in addition to the troops then stationed there. Later in the day I received a report from the person I had sent to Liverpool, and according to that report it had been ascertained that on the previous Friday evening there had been held a meeting of Fenians, who had resolved to attack the town of Chester on the Monday morning for the purpose of obtaining the arms and ammunition contained in the Castle. So far, the report received from Liverpool corresponded with circumstances mentioned in the telegrams which came from the Mayor of Chester, and this correspondence gave a serious aspect to the affair. Still later in the day I received two other telegrams—one with reference to the calling out of the Volunteers in case the troops in the Castle should require additional support, and the other a general telegram as to how they were to act. With regard to the first, I replied that the Mayor ought not to call out the Volunteers in their military capacity; that it would be their duty to aid in preserving the public peace as much as it was the duty of any other civilians to do so; and that in case of emergency they would be justified in using their arms, not in a military capacity, but as I have stated. With regard to the second telegram, I replied that the Mayor had better put himself in communication with Major General Sir John Garvock, who commands the troops in the northern division of England; and a further telegram was sent to General Garvock, instructing him to put himself in communication with the Mayor of Chester, and so save telegraphic messages coming to the Home Office. That was all that had been done up to the time the House met yesterday. Yesterday evening, while my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was making his statement to the House, I received a further telegram from the Mayor of Chester, and it was as nearly as possible in these words—

On receipt of the telegram I communicated with the heads of the Departments as much connected with such a subject as is my own, and we consulted as to the course that had better be taken. We agreed, inasmuch as there was no specific statement that these strangers were armed, and inasmuch as there was a great absence of details such as would justify the Government in adopting extraordinary measures, to send telegrams to the Mayor of Chester and to General Garvock. That addressed to General Garvock inquired whether the strangers in Chester were armed; if so, whether he required any further force; and, if he required such force, to what extent. That sent to the Mayor was to this effect—

We determined not to send any troops in addition to those which had been sent until we got an answer to those telegrams; but my Colleagues agreed with me that, if we did have an answer, then I should be at liberty to communicate with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, and that such measures might be adopted as might be deemed advisable. I ought to observe, that in the interim we had desired that a battalion of Guards should be in readiness in case they were needed; and also that a train should be kept under steam ready for their conveyance. I received no answer to either telegram until this morning. I received the answer to the Mayor's telegram first, about one o'clock this morning, and from General Garvock about a quarter past four. The telegram from the Mayor was to this effect—

“There are 1,500 strangers in the city; they have come from Liverpool, Manchester, Halifax, Stalybridge, and other places. The town is in great excitement. Please telegraph directly to Manchester for more military. All our other means of prevention are exhausted.”

I considered what was best to be done under these circumstances, and upon these reports. I wrote to the Brigade Major of the Guards, sending the letter through my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, stating that I thought he had better send down 500 Guards for these reasons—first of all, because it would be very detrimental to denude Manchester of troops instead of sending them from London, and it was important if any outbreak occurred, that Liverpool and other towns in the neighbourhood should be as much protected as Chester; in the second place, I thought that prevention was better than cure; and thirdly, I believed that instead of waiting for morning, if it was known that the Guards were in Chester when the people rose from their beds, it would have a greater effect by inspiring confidence among the good and peaceful inhabitants, and striking terror among the evil-disposed. It was under these circumstances that the troops were sent. Three hours afterwards I received a telegram from General Garvock, who did not take so gloomy a view of the affair as had been taken by the civil authorities. He thought the troops in Chester were sufficient for its protection. I have no detailed intelligence beyond what I have now given to the House. I have no detailed intelligence received to-day. I hear that several of these men went away last night or early in the morning; I hear further that several of these strangers were in Chester two days; but, until I receive fuller information, I am not able to communicate to the House anything beyond what I have briefly and plainly stated. I have given no opinion as to whether this is a Fenian outbreak or not; but the circumstances unquestionably point in that direction. I trust the course the Government has taken will meet with the approbation of the House, and show those, if there be such in England, who wish for an outbreak, that they will be sure to be repelled without promoting the mischief they intend.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Has the right hon. Gentleman received any information as to whether the strangers in Chester were armed; what their conduct was; what they did; and whether they threatened the Castle or made any other demonstration?

MR. WALPOLE: I have received no information down to this moment as to whether they were armed or not.

MR. OWEN STANLEY wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, what the military force at Chester Castle was on Friday last?

MR. WALPOLE: I hope the House will not press for that information till to-morrow.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he would give notice of a Question on the subject.

Mr. Walpole

LORD ELCHO: I think it right—as I am in possession of a telegram from Chester from Earl Grosvenor, who went down yesterday afternoon—he being in command of the Chester troop of Yeomanry—that I should inform the House of its contents. It arrived at four o'clock this afternoon, and is to the following effect:—"Was serious. Timely information saved the town. All right now."

GRANTS FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

COLONEL SYKES rose to call the attention of the House to the Grants of Money, authorized by the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 109, for constructing Fortifications to the number of seventy-one, and to move an Address for a Return of the past and prospective outlay in detail upon the seventy-one Works [in a form stated.] He said, it was not his desire to invite discussion at present, but to ask the House to consider the subject by the help of the facts which this Return would supply, before they granted further supplies for these fortifications. The House had engaged to lay out £11,500,000 upon the seventy-one works, not including the central arsenal at Weedon. Since 1860, when this money was granted, the opinions of engineers must have undergone great change; and he should, at a future time, raise the question whether in the interest of the taxpayers of this country it was desirable to carry out the project, which was the result of panic arising from the alleged foolish boasting of some French colonels. The money already raised was £5,200,000, the first grant having been £2,000,000, the second £1,000,000, and £650,000 in succeeding years until 1866. His object in now asking for these particulars was to elicit facts upon which the House might form their own judgment.

GENERAL PEEL: So far from having any objection to furnish the Return moved for, my hon. and gallant Friend has only anticipated me in doing nearly what I proposed to have done myself. During the recess I called for a Report for the express purpose of laying it upon the table of the House. That Report was upon the progress made in constructing the fortifications. It gives an account of all the steps that have been taken, the different Acts of Parliament passed upon the subject, and the sums raised under those Acts of Parliament. It then goes on to give a short statement with reference to the object and the nature of each work included in the schedule of the Fortification Act of 1865, the progress made in its construction, the expenditure and liability incurred thereon, and the probable sum for which it will be completed. This Return would now have been in the hands of Members if I had not delayed it in order to carry the expenditure down to the 1st of January; but it will be in the hands of Members in the course of a very few days. I think that my hon. and gallant Friend is quite right in deprecating any discussion until the Returns are presented. But no person can be more anxious than I am that the House should be placed in possession of the fullest information upon this point. Up to the present moment the Government have incurred no responsibility whatever with regard to these fortifications. The works have been going on during the time we have been in Office, but those works are under contracts made before we came into Office. I certainly proposed last year to move for £50,000, in order to carry out works necessary for the defence of the Thames, which, at the present moment, is not defended at all. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) objected to that outlay, because the work was not one of those included in the schedule of the Act, and therefore it should not be paid for by money raised by a Vote of this House. On looking into the Act, I found that the right hon. Gentleman was right in that objection. I hold the late Government responsible for the completion of the works included in the schedule laid before Parliament in the Act of 1865. According to that schedule the estimated expenditure upon these works was not, as my hon. and gallant Friend says, £11,000,000—that was the amount contemplated by the first schedule—but £6,995,000, or, in round numbers, £7,000,000. But I hold the late Government responsible for more than that. The Estimate that I shall lay on the table for the completion of these works will show an excess of £152,000, which, considering that labour has risen 15 per cent since the Estimates were first made and the works first planned, is no very great excess. But there is a further Estimate which will be necessary to complete the works as they certainly ought to be completed. A great many of these batteries will be perfectly useless unless sheathed with iron, and it is also necessary to place in turrets and on turn-tables the heavy guns with which those batteries must be armed. The additional expense required for this iron sheathing and these turn-tables will be very nearly £1,000,000. I hope, however, that this expenditure may be met by deducting the outlay contemplated upon works which were included in the schedule but have not yet been commenced. Thus there is a contemplated charge of £500,000 for defences at Chatham, and another sum of £150,000 for the purchase of a site for a central arsenal; and I hope that those sums may be struck out of the schedule. When these Returns are laid on the table I shall be able to show conclusively that up to this moment the present Government have incurred no responsibility whatever with regard to these fortifications, and that it will be for the House to consider whether they shall be completed and supplied with iron shields, turrets, and turn-tables. I have to add that there is one portion of the expense of these fortifications which it was always intended to throw upon the annual Estimates—that is to say, the armaments. Now, although that conclusion was come to in 1860, it was only in the present year that any guns have been prepared. An extraordinary estimate was made by the hon. Baronet (Sir Morton Peto), who frightened the House by declaring, if I remember rightly, that £17,000,000 would be necessary to complete the armaments and the ammunition of these fortifications. My noble Friend the late Secretary for War estimated the amount which would be requisite at £3,000,000; and owing to the great reduction in the expense of making guns, and also of shot, I do not believe that the armaments of these fortifications will amount to much more than half the £3,000,000 stated by my noble Friend. Every information will be given to the House in this Return, which will be in the possession of the House in a day or two.

Motion agreed to.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill relating to Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, said, that last Session he had the honour of introducing a similar measure, which was read a second time without a division. It was then referred to a Select Committee, which reported unanimously in its favour. The Bill was intended to provide better dwellings for artizans and labourers; and he asked to introduce it now in the same terms as he had reported it from the Select Committee of last Session. The measure was therefore no longer his, but that of the Select Committee. It was not found possible to pass the Bill last year, and he now asked the House to re-consider the subject. The additional information which he had been able to obtain between the end of the last and the opening of the present Session led him to the conclusion that matters were getting worse rather than better, and that the want of accommodation and the amount of misery which resulted from it far exceeded all that voluntary efforts could do to afford relief. All that many benevolent and enterprising persons like Alderman Waterlow could effect was as nothing compared to what was urgently demanded. The Industrial Dwellings Company had spent £40,000, and thereby given relief to 1,400 or 1,500 persons. At this rate the advance of £1,000,000 by the Public Works Loan Commissioners, as proposed by this Bill, would enable them to provide in one year for 35,000 people. He did not ask that that sum should be lent at once, but only tentatively; and he begged the House to remember that it was not out of the general taxation of the country that he asked the loan to be advanced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer debited himself to the amount of some £46,000,000 or £47,000,000, a portion of the thrift and savings of the working classes, and as the Government paid only 2½ per cent on that vast sum, it was not unreasonable to ask that £1,000,000 should be lent back at 3½ per cent. It was said, by way of objection, "If those dwellings will pay a remunerative interest, why not leave it to private enterprize to deal with the emergency?" But building speculations, if properly carried on, would require 8 or 10 per cent, and private enterprize sought only the sunny spots, while it left the dark spots of pestilence and death wholly unrelieved. He was prepared, however, to show that no loss could accrue to the public. Whatever sums were advanced by the Exchequer Loan Commissioners would be charged by way of mortgage on the buildings to be erected, the plans and surveys of which would be laid before them, and they would have the security of the municipal and in London of the metropolitan rate to make up any deficiency. He proposed to adopt a plan which was in successful operation in Liverpool — namely, that houses condemned by the officer of health should be presented before the grand jury; that the owner should be allowed a reasonable time in which to rebuild them; and that if he failed to do so they should be bought by the municipal body, which should rebuild them, and after the lapse of seven years should re-sell the property. He had reason to hope that the Metropolitan Board of Works would be willing to undertake the duty which would thus be cast upon them; and he believed that no burden would be imposed on the ratepayers, since the increasing value of house property was a sufficient assurance that houses re-built by the Board would re-imburse the original outlay. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. WALPOLE remarked that at the late period at which the hon. Gentleman brought in his Bill last Session, it was hardly possible for the Government to bestow any consideration upon it. In the general object of the Bill he, for one, most heartily concurred; but he wished to guard himself from expressing an opinion on that part of it containing an important provision relating to the property and rights of individuals, which required to be carefully looked into. With that qualification he should be happy to give his support to the Bill.

MR. J. B. SMITH contended that it would be useless for capitalists to compete with persons who built houses and required only 5 per cent interest, and that the Bill would therefore place them in an unfair position. He thought his hon. Friend had taken a leaf out of Louis Blanc's book, and that if he began by building houses for artizans, he would end by establishing ateliers nationaux.

MR. LOCKE observed, that if the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) wished to protect persons who were anxious to spend their money in building houses there could not be the slightest objection to their doing that, and especially in neighbourhoods where better dwellings for the poor were wanted. The object of the Bill was to destroy fever nests in the metropolis, and they had the evidence of medical men, officers of the boards of health numberless, to the fact that without some such Bill it was impossible that the public health could be protected. This was not the first time that a strong feeling of political economy had been brought to bear against a charitable and humane scheme for the benefit of the poor. There were spots in the metropolis which had been condemned over and over again, situate in a cul-de-sac, where it was impossible fresh air could penetrate, and where disease generally prevailed, and it was proposed that the municipal or local authorities should have the power of condemning the houses in these localities, and seeing that proper dwellings were erected in their place. The late Government approved of the principle, and also of lending money to carry out the object. His right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for the Home Department said he entirely approved of the Bill; and the only question was, whether the interests of private individuals had been guarded with sufficient care. In the Committee which sat last year on the Bill this point was very carefully considered, and he believed there were ample clauses in this Bill to protect the interests of individuals. He had asked one of the directors of Mr. Alderman Waterlow's Company, whether some of their buildings in the borough paid 5-per cent, and the reply was that they paid 10. "How was that?" he inquired; and the director replied, "In consequence of the locality being near their work, so as to enable the tenants to go home to their meals." That was a strong argument in favour of removing these pestilential buildings and erecting others in their place for the working classes, instead of driving those classes to the suburbs. The working classes, like the rest of the community, objected to being driven out of the localities in which they had hitherto dwelt, and be thus cut off from those associations which they had been accustomed to enjoy. It was likewise most objectionable that they should be compelled to dwell in places at a distance from the metropolis entirely alone. It was desirable that all classes should be in proximity to one another, so that the less fortunate might profit by the example and support of those who were more affluent than themselves. These objects the Bill was well calculated to effect.

COLONEL SYKES said, the question was not whether money should be found for building dwellings for the poor, but whether they should, with a view to the public advantage, try to get rid of disease and misery. Enormous mortality was caused by people being crowded together in what were little better than dungeons. He regretted that Scotland was excluded from the benefit of the recent Act allowing loans for such improvements, for there was a sanitary society in Aberdeen which had effected great good, but which was unfortunately short of funds, and when he applied to Mr. Spearman for a loan he was surprised to find there was a clause exempting Scotland. He hoped the rents for houses thus re-built would be fixed at sums which working men could afford to pay, for in Aberdeen lodgings were provided at as low a sum as 1s. 9d. a week.

Mr. KINNAIRD was glad to state that the Government had consented to include Scotland and Ireland within the operation of the recent Act. He rejoiced also to find that they were prepared to give the fairest consideration to the present Bill, and he hoped it would become law this Session.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide better Dwellings in Towns for Artizans and Labourers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. McCULLAGH TORRENS, Mr. KINNAIRD, and Mr. LOCKE.

COMMUTATION OF CHURCH RATES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the Commutation of Church Rates. Last year he introduced the same measure, but withdrew it in deference to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the Commutation of Church Rates."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished for some explanation on the part of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. He presumed it was the Bill of last year for commuting church rates; and if so, it contained a proposition to impose a rate of 2d. in the pound upon all real estate for the maintenance of the fabrics of churches. This rate would produce a sum of £800,000 or £900,000 per annum. He believed the hon. Member for North Warwickshire disputed his figures; but that was the result of his own calculation. Were they to have the same Bill this year as they had for several years preceding? He thought it would be wise to let the subject drop. It had been before the House thirty years, and the character of the House had not risen in consequence. He hoped that the Government would express an opinion on the subject. It would not do to keep this question constantly before the country. He thought there should be a dissolution between Church and State. It should never be forgotten that the Nonconformists claimed to be a majority of the people of England; that in Scotland the Church of England had not many supporters; that in Ireland the Church was not one-eighth of the people. Under these circumstances, to have a Bill thrown in their teeth claiming a rate of 2*d.* in the pound was too bad. It was time that this was put an end to; and he moved, as an Amendment, "the Previous Question."

MR. CANDLISH seconded the Amendment.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Hadfield.)

MR. NEWDEGATE, in explanation, said, the hon. Member was speaking of a Bill not in his hand; and he had made a most extraordinary statement with respect to the Bill of last Session. The hon. Member had said that he (Mr. Newdegate) intended, by the Bill of last year, to impose a charge on real property amounting to £800,000 or £900,000 a year. The hon. Member could not have read that Bill. He (Mr. Newdegate) remembered explaining to the hon. Member some years ago that such was not the effect, or the purpose, or the intention of the Bill. He could only express a hope that as the subject had been discussed in the House of Commons, he would be allowed to lay the Bill on the table of the House.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was a matter of ordinary courtesy to allow an hon. Member to introduce a Bill, and he hoped the hon. Member for Sheffield would not oppose that course on the present occasion.

MR. HADFIELD then withdrew his Amendment.

Previous Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. NEWDEGATE and Colonel STUART.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE O'CONOR DON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to extend the Industrial Schools Act to Ireland, said, that the measure was the same as the Act passed for Great Britain last Session, with such modifications as were required by the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. He had taken the Irish Reformatory Act as the model on which those alterations were made. The necessity for such a measure was even greater in Ireland than in England. From the judicial statistics published by the Irish Government, it appeared that the criminal statistics of Ireland compared favourably in every respect with those of England, except in the item of juvenile vagrancy. The number of juvenile vagrants and tramps in Ireland was twice as great as in England in proportion to the population, and this was mainly attributable to the fact that there was no institution in Ireland to which these unfortunate children could be sent. The Act of last Session had given general satisfaction.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to extend the Industrial Schools Act to Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The O'CONOR DON, Mr. MONSELL, and Mr. LEATHAM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 17.]

TESTS ABOLITION OXFORD BILL.

RESOLUTION IN COMMITTEE. BILL ORDERED.

FIRST READING.

(In the Committee.)

MR. COLERIDGE moved a Resolution,

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the abolition of Religious Tests in connection with Academical Degrees and Offices in the University of Oxford."

MR. FAWCETT thought the House would remember that last Session the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, in one of the most completely Liberal speeches he ever made in the House on the Universities, strongly advised that so far as possible some of these Bills should be united, and that the House should not be troubled with constant repetitions of the same question. The Bill of the hon. and learned Member was distinct in principle from that of another hon. Member, because the latter affected endowments, while the present Bill simply related to degrees and offices in the University, and he was aware that some who would vote for one would not support the other. What he rose for was to give notice that if the Bill of the hon. and learned Member went into Committee, he should move that it be an Instruction to the Committee that the Bill be made to apply to the University of Cambridge as well as to the University of Oxford.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the abolition of Religious Tests in connection with Academical Degrees and Offices in the University of Oxford.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. COLERIDGE and Mr. GRANT DUFF.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 16.]

RAILWAY DEBENTURE HOLDERS BILL. LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WATKIN, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for affording better security to the holders of Railway Debentures, said, that it would be unnecessary to trouble the House at any length, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, to whom he had submitted a sketch of the Bill, had intimated that he would not oppose its introduction. He merely wished to say that he brought in the Bill in the interest of the 80,000 or 100,000 persons who were the owners of the £120,000,000 invested in railway debentures, and the object of it was to remove by legislation certain difficulties which had arisen, and to provide machinery by which, in certain cases, debenture-holders might take some share in the management of their own affairs. He desired to remove an impression which might be created by what he had said on a previous occasion—that the nominal capital of railway property in difficulties was one-tenth of the whole. Upon further examination, and having had a table carefully prepared, he found that the gross nominal capital of railways, where the interest on debentures had failed to be paid, was £24,700,000. This included nearly £17,000,000, the nominal capital of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. Out of the £24,700,000 of nominal capital, £6,600,000 only consisted of debentures, of which sum nearly £5,000,000 attached to the Chatham. Thus the whole nominal amounts of capital of unsound lines was less than 5 per cent of the whole railway capital of the country; and the

debenture-debt, inclusive of that of the Chatham, was only $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and exclusive of the Chatham, only 6s. 8d. per cent. Was it not, therefore, unnecessary that the House should be asked to take into consideration any general scheme of legislation? At the same time, he thought that whenever a railway company, sound or unsound, applied to Parliament to regulate its capital account, and to enable it to meet its liabilities and complete its works, it would be the duty of the House rather to facilitate than to place any difficulties in the way of such an application. Many cases had occurred in which difficulties had been got over by means of a perfect agreement between all parties interested. The House would remember the case of the Caledonian Railway. It was in the greatest difficulties when the shareholders and bondholders devised a scheme, to which they ultimately obtained the sanction of Parliament, and in the result secured a large measure of prosperity. He was not without hope that, if a similar course were adopted, companies now in difficulties might, in the course of two or three years, be successfully extricated from them. It must be borne in mind that he was speaking in the interest of property equal to £450,000,000, the development of which had conferred an enormous advantage to the trade of the country. He might say, for the satisfaction of the debenture-holders, that at the end of 1865 the debenture capital was under £100,000,000, and at the end of 1866 it was under £120,000,000. The total net profit earned by railway capital in 1865 was nearly £19,000,000, and in 1866 it was nearly £21,000,000. Therefore, if six years' net revenue of all the railways were thrown together, it would pay off the whole of the debentures, which were the first mortgage on the undertaking. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he saw no objection to the introduction of the Bill, as its provisions were prospective only. By the time it came on for second reading the House would have had an opportunity of seeing whether the plan could be adopted without injustice to other classes of creditors. He was glad the hon. Gentleman took the same view as he himself had ventured to express the other evening—namely, that it was desirable when cases such as those to which the hon. Member referred arose they should be dealt with by special legislation. He also concurred with the hon. Gentleman in thinking we might look forward to a more satisfactory state of the railway world. He believed there was unnecessary panic in reference to railway property.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for affording better security to the holders of Railway Debentures, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WATKIN, Mr. Alderman SALOMONS, and Mr. LAING.

ASSOCIATIONS OF WORKMEN BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. NEATE rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to exempt during a limited time Associations of Workmen which were in respect of any part of their constitution entitled to the benefits of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, from forfeiture of those benefits by reason of their being in other parts of their constitution adapted to the purposes of a trades union. The hon. Member remarked, that previously to 1825 all combinations of workmen for the object of getting any advance of wages were illegal; but in that year a measure was passed removing all liability in criminal proceedings from all societies of a peaceable kind, and these societies continued for a long time to enjoy such facilities for the administration of their funds as the law then allowed to other societies. Then came the Friendly Societies' Act of the 18 & 19 Vict., in which special facilities were given to what were termed Friendly Societies—that is, societies raised and constituted in pursuance of the provisions of the Act. At that time there were friendly societies which partook to a certain degree of the character of trades unions, and on these also certain advantages were conferred by a clause introduced into the Act of 1844. Very recently, however, on the occasion of the treasurer of a society absconding and the matter being brought before a magistrate, the magistrate refused to grant a warrant, on the ground that the society was not entitled to the benefit of the Friendly Societies' Act, on account of its being partly of a trades union character. Subsequently the decision of the magistrates was confirmed by the Court of Queen's Bench. He did not question for a moment that the decision was right; but still, it was productive of great inconvenience, and he might mention that it affected not only trades unions of the most complicated and oppressive character, but also those which were of the most innocent kind. It might be that the forthcoming inquiry on the subject of trades unions might exclude them from the pale of the law; but that certainly had not hitherto been the intention of the House of Commons, because, for example, four years ago they were empowered to invest their funds on the security of the Post Office savings banks. In his opinion, a Bill ought to be passed to protect these associations—at any rate, for a time and until the whole law had been considered—from the effect of the recent decision. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. WALPOLE: The difficulty proposed to be dealt with is very great, as it will be necessary to draw a line between such societies as ought to take advantage of the Friendly Societies' Act and those societies which are contrary to law. Of course, I can give no opinion on the hon. Member's measure till I have seen its provisions, but I shall not oppose the introduction of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to exempt Associations of Workmen from certain disabilities for a limited time, ordered to be brought in by Mr. NEATE and Mr. THOMAS HUGHES.

THAMES NAVIGATION BILL.

Bill "for extending to the Thames between Staines and the Metropolis the provisions of 'The Thames Navigation Act, 1866,' relating to the prevention of the pollution of the River; and for otherwise extending and amending the Thames Conservancy and Navigation Acts; and for other purposes," read the first time.

PUBLIC BILLS — Second Reading — Finsbury Estate [1]; Joint Stock Companies (Voting Papers)* [3].

(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Locke.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. AYRTON said, he had thought he should not be compelled to trouble the House at any length in respect to this Bill, because it had been fully considered by the House last Session, when it received a second reading. At that time the then Secretary for the Home Department recognised the principle on which it was based; but acquiescing in the second reading, reserved to himself the right of considering its details in Committee. Soon after the second reading the momentous vote occurred which transferred the then Secretary of State to the Opposition side of the House, and placed the right hon. Gentleman who now held the office in his stead. The progress of public business was for some time interrupted, owing to the delay which occurred in the formation of the new Government, and to other attendant circumstances. The second reading having taken place in the beginning of June, he (Mr. Ayrton) was unable to move for the Committee on the Bill until July. The right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State then appealed to him to defer the Bill until this Session, giving him at the same time an assurance that nothing would be done by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to alter the position of this question. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners as a body had not done anything in the matter certainly; but one of the Commissioners, their representative in that House, now declared his intention to oppose this Bill altogether, and not allow it even to reach a second reading, being the stage it occupied last Session. It appeared to him (Mr. Ayrton) that such a course on the part of the Commissioner in that House was in violation of the spirit of the arrangement entered into last Session. As the second reading of this Bill was to be opposed, it was necessary for him to enter more fully into the subject than he should otherwise have desired. This was by no means a new proposition, and there could be no doubt that if it had not been for the spoliation of the property of the Church at the time of the Reformation, into which it was not necessary for them to enter, the Church would have been in the possession of funds sufficient not only for the spiritual consolation, but also for the Christian education of the large and growing population of the metropolis. Unfortunately, in the evil times to which he referred, the funds of the Church were confiscated, and were bestowed on Court favourites, and formed the bases and the foundation of great fortunes. After those worst of times, as regarded the spoliation of ecclesiastical property, every one would admit that it might have been discontinued; but he was sorry to say that ever since the Reformation the Church had suffered worse spoliation of a different character. In the last century an estate which belonged to St. Paul's Cathedral became, by the instrumentality of the Duke of Grafton, the foundation of the property of the Southampton family, and was now known as the Southampton estate. Another great property in Paddington, known as "the Bishop of London's Estate," was at a still more recent period taken from the Church and devoted to the private profit of the descendants of one of the former Bishops of London. These were not the only transactions, however, with regard to Church property that had occurred within the limits of the metropolis. The property with which his Bill proposed to deal was a large one on the north side of London, originally of a poor character, and still recollected as the region of Moorfields, though now known as the "Finsbury Estate." It was an endowment in connection with one of the stalls at St. Paul's, and the endowment was called "the Finsbury Prebend." The corporation of the City of London had obtained leases of the property from time to time ; and, at last, became the lessees of a building lease, which eventually led to the estate being covered with houses mostly of a superior character. The corporation of London some years ago endeavoured to imitate the transactions of the Grafton family with reference to the Southampton property ; but owing to a most fortunate interposition, which might be called providential, these intentions were frustrated. He had been informed that a day was fixed for the ratification of the transaction, which would have for ever deprived the Church of this valuable property ; but the corporation officer, unfortunately for them, ate and drank so much overnight that he afterwards sickened and died of inanition, and thus the opportunity of the corporation of London being able to obtain this property passed away for ever. Instead, therefore, of the income from this estate going towards a fund for defraying the expenses of the eating and drinking of that distinguished body, the corporation of London, it was still available for the spiritual wants of the metropolis. Their lease of the property expired this year. The question, therefore, was what was to be done with this property, the income of which amounted to £48,000 a year, which would certainly increase in years to come. In consequence of the great amount of spiritual destitution which existed in the metropolis, a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed in 1858 to inquire into the subject, composed of the two Archbishops, several Bishops, and Peers. And if any Committee could speak with the weight of authority upon this question, that Committee was entitled to the distinction. The Committee, after taking a considerable amount of evidence, made a Report in which they set forth, in very clear and precise terms, the amount and extent of the spiritual destitution which prevailed in the metropolis. He would not, however, trouble the House with the details to which that Committee referred, because since then circumstances in connection with it had been somewhat modified ; but if there had been an amelioration of the destitution then acknowledged to exist, there had been on the other hand a very large increase of population, carrying with it also a new condition of spiritual destitution. The Committee, after describing the deplorable state of the Church, its utter inefficiency to fulfil the duties expected of it, and the necessity there was of making some change, proceeded to make several suggestions. In looking to the sources from which they might anticipate aid towards the relief of the spiritual destitution of the metropolis, the first that presented itself was the vested and expectant interests the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had in certain large estates which formerly belonged to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, some of which were of great value, particularly that of Finsbury, which was represented at £7,000 per annum, with the prospect of its being increased eight or nine times that amount when the lease expired in 1867. It could not be said that his proposal took the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by surprise, or that it was brought forward for the first time. The Committee advised an alteration in the law by which, as it now stands, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are not authorized to give preference, in the spiritual assistance given by them, to places where revenue is received, except where such revenue arises from tithes. That Committee thought that the principle applied to tithes ought to be extended to other property ; that the wants of any community ought to have the first claim on any funds raised amongst them ; and that this principle more especially held good with respect to the metropolis. The Committee went on to say—

“The whole metropolis constitutes one great community, which has given a high value to the houses and buildings now on such estates, and which also causes great spiritual destitution in the metropolitan parishes. Therefore, the existing law should be amended so as to direct the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to deal with the property in question on the principle proposed, so far as it could be done without interfering with the changes and obligations created by Parliament, or already incurred by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.”

It was proposed by those high in authority, with reference to the Report of 1858, that the powers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to deal with these funds should be limited to the engagements they had then made, and not to any future ones. Therefore, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had full notice of what would be expected of Parliament in dealing with this subject. Since then the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had proceeded to deal with the funds at their disposal by increasing the endowments in parishes possessing a certain population, but they did not adopt any special rule to enable them to deal with particular cases, and the question, some time after the Report referred to, was brought under the consideration of the House. On that occasion the inhabitants of the diocese of Durham showed to the House what injustice sprung from the narrow views of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and a few years ago an amendment was made in the law, in accordance with the Lords' Report, so as to authorize the Commissioners to deal with funds such as those arising from the Finsbury Estate, in giving a preference to the place from which the revenue to be disposed of arose. A difficulty had, however, arisen in reference to the definition of the word "place;" and upon that difficulty the Commissioners did not seem to have arrived at any conclusion, except as regarded the diocese of Durham, where they made "place" applicable to a mining district in which the people who created the property resided, and there the population had been provided for in preference to the general claims of the country at large. That principle, he contended, was easy of general extension. The word "place" was unsuited to the metropolis unless it meant the metropolis itself. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, instead of taking the views laid down by the Lords' Committee, had adopted an arbitrary and capricious solution of the difficulty, and they had therefore, three years ago, adopted the scheme by which they proceeded to endow all parishes or ecclesiastical districts having a certain amount of population (first 8,000, then 7,000, and again 6,000) out of their funds to the extent of £300 per annum. That was obviously a rule of the most rigid character which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had laid down for the whole country, without regard to the special circumstances of the place. The consequence of that rule with regard to the metropolis had been to make the funds available for the benefit of the rich, and to deprive the poor of any participation in them; because what was easy for the rich to provide by way of endowment, in order to obtain a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, was entirely out of the power of the poor, and, consequently, they could not obtain the required assistance from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, because they only gave in return for funds subscribed where the patronage was in the hands of private individuals. Suppose handsome houses were built upon the Grosvenor Estate. The rent of each might be £100 a year or upwards, and the inhabitants might claim the benefit of the fund, because the rule was laid down that if they themselves subscribed a certain amount a grant would be made by the Commission. On the other hand, if a church were required in a poor district the Commissioners would give no assistance, as they only made grants in return for subscriptions raised among the residents. That was the rule established in regard to ecclesiastical patronage in private hands. Money was given to benefit private patronage, and yet the patron might dispose of his property by auction immediately afterwards. He maintained that such a method was most unfortunate for the interests of the poorest classes. Then, again, the system did not deal with one of the great difficulties of the metropolis; because, though the Commissioners said they would raise the income of a clergyman where the population exceeded 5,000 or 6,000 or more, there were many parishes in London where the population was 11,000 or 12,000 or upwards, and unless such parishes could immediately find money to build two or three new churches and divided themselves into districts, none of the additional population would be entitled to the benefit of the fund. Therefore, all the large parishes in the metropolis were excluded from the benefits given to less necessitous parishes which came within the rigid rule propounded by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. And what was the result of this? It was found in the endeavour of the Bishop of London to grapple with the residuum of spiritual destitution left in consequence of the arbitrary proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Reports showed that there was a vast amount of spiritual destitution unprovided for, and the Bishop of London had invited the wealthier classes to make a large contribution with a view to its removal. In addition to the Bishop of London's Fund, there was another of a similar kind established on the other side of the Thames under the auspices of the Bishop of Winchester. But, however strenuously these appeals had been made to the generosity of the public, they had, in point of fact, failed, and he himself ventured to tell the Bishop of London before he embarked in his undertaking that it would prove a failure, because the public knew that there were large public funds already existing for the purpose, and that, consequently, every one who subscribed to the Bishop's fund would be keeping up these abuses in the Church. Unfortunately, his expectation had been fulfilled. The amount subscribed by the benevolent public was not sufficient even to deal with what he might call the subsidiary difficulties of the poorer classes in the metropolis. These attempts to provide for the spiritual destitution of the metropolis having failed, they were compelled to fall back upon the principle laid down by the Committee of the House of Lords for providing a real and substantial fund for the purpose of ministering to the spiritual wants of the poorer classes of the metropolis at large. He had adverted to the schemes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and shown how illusory they were. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners would, however, have them to believe that they had done quite enough for the metropolis, and that they ought not to be asked to do more. Last Session, for instance, remarks had been made tending to impress that House with the notion that the Commissioners had expended an enormous sum on the metropolis, and that this demand was unnecessary. Now, the Commissioners had not expended in capital any very large sum for the building of churches, for it only amounted to £59,000 of capital; and that included several parishes not in the metropolis, so that it would perhaps be more accurate to fix the sum at £55,000. Their accounts showed that they had up to the middle of last year granted endowments to churches, &c., to the amount of £25,865. But they had received from the property in the metropolis—property created entirely by the growth of the metropolis—no less than £48,889 a year, so that, in effect, they had granted for some parts of the metropolis about half the sum which they had received. But the mode in which their grants had been made did not deal with the real and the growing evil. The proceedings of the Commissioners had been brought under the consideration of that House some time ago by the Report of a Select Committee, and he did not think that on that occasion they made out a very good case why they should enjoy the confidence of the House. In the Report of the Committee of that House in 1863 it was declared that the Ecclesiastical Commission, as at present constituted, was objectionable, and that it did not appear to have any established system for ascertaining the localities where spiritual destitution was most prevalent, nor any sufficient rules for determining the priority to be observed in affording relief to such districts. But now this Commission, the conduct of which had been condemned by both Houses of Parliament, and had neglected entirely that which it was its first duty to perform, came forward to prevent the further consideration of this Bill. He trusted, however, that the House would not indulge the wishes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in this respect. If the House wanted to know what faithful stewards they were of the public money, he would read a statement sent to him by a gentleman who was formerly a Member of the House of Commons (Mr. Alderman Copeland). This statement gave the result of the labours of the Commissioners for the benefit of the poor people of this country. It appeared, then, that in the year ending the 1st of November, 1865, they had expended on Ecclesiastical Commissioners themselves, and on clerks, secretaries, and other officers, attorneys, surveyors, architects, and agents of every kind, £71,418; while they had expended for the relief of spiritual destitution the sum of £219,000. Now, why should not a part of the first named sum—about one-third of the whole—which they squandered among themselves, be a fund reserved to meet the most necessitous cases among the large and, to a great extent, destitute population of the metropolis? In order to escape, if possible, from the slightest interference on the part of the House of Commons the Commissioners had adopted a most remarkable course of procedure. Four years ago they drew up a Report, in which they said they thought they should do so and so in the next four years, but at the expiration of that period they spoke of their previously expressed intentions as arrangements or engagements they had made. In that way they endeavoured to prevent Parliament from taking into consideration any Bill like the present. He would, however, refer to what the House of Lords said ought to be done in 1866, and to the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons which sat three or four years ago. The present measure rested upon the simple principle that the whole value of this property had been created by the aggregation of the metropolitan population, and, though it was no doubt true that the houses built on this spot were houses in which poor people did not reside, yet the inhabitants of them were merchants who carried on business in London, and who dealt with the population generally, bringing about them retail traders and skilled working people, who in turn brought about them the poorer and more dependent classes. Therefore, the value which had been created was, in point of fact, the value of the people, who now asked to have it applied somewhat for their benefit. They did not ask for all, but merely wished that one-half should be appropriated as a special fund for the poorer districts. That, instead of being an extravagant demand, was, in his opinion, a reasonable compromise. What he asked was that the House should affirm that the arbitrary principle of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, disregarding the special demands of the poorer classes, should no longer be acted upon as regards the poorer classes of the metropolis; but that special provision should be made in order to meet their spiritual destitution. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. HOWES said, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets had brought, as it appeared to him, a charge of want of good faith against the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to which body he had the honour to belong. He must, in the first place, disclaim the idea that he was there to represent a body like the Ecclesiastical Commission. He merely spoke as a member and not as the representative of that body. In its interest, but still more in the interest of the public at large, he opposed the Bill. He was not answerable for what the Secretary of State said last year in reference to it, but he understood that it passed under some misapprehension. He was not prepared on the present occasion for a general attack on the rules, regulations, and system of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but he must protest against the extreme and remarkable misrepresentations of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets respecting several of those rules. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the Commissioners gave, without discrimination, benefactions to private patrons of benefices, whereas it was well known that benefactions were only given to benefices in private patronage, where there was a large population which implied the spiritual destitution which it was the object of the Commission to relieve. Then, the hon. Gentleman alleged that parishes with a very large population did not receive any contribution for the surplus population; but it was well known that under the Act brought in by Sir Robert Peel any district might be separated from a populous parish before the church was built. As to what had been said about the Committee of the House of Lords in 1858, he would admit that for many years after the establishment of the common fund the Ecclesiastical Commission, not having the funds at its disposal which had since accumulated, was not able to distribute largely throughout the country. But after the Report of the Committee was issued it was found that a more extended system of distribution might be commenced, and the operations of the Commission on a large scale really commenced in the beginning of the year 1864. It was proposed that in five years, from 1864 to the end of 1868, such a sum should be distributed as would raise all livings in public patronage with a population of 4,000 or upwards to the moderate income of £300 a year; and all livings in private patronage with the same population were to be raised to the same amount, provided one-half of the required funds were raised from other sources. Again, £100,000 a year was proposed to be distributed to meet benefactions which arose from various private sources, and such districts as the hon. Gentleman had referred to were to be endowed up to £200 a year. That scheme had been received by the country generally with great satisfaction, and no doubt it had relieved a vast amount of spiritual destitution. The object of the Bill was to abstract from the common fund a far larger amount than had been stated by the hon. Gentleman. He believed the whole Finsbury Estate produced about £60,000 a year, and the hon. Gentleman proposed to deprive the common fund of £30,000 a year, or what would amount to nearly £1,000,000. The scheme of 1864 had been repeated in separate Reports since, and had been accepted by the House as an obligation which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had incurred, and he maintained that that obligation was a pledge upon their revenues. The whole scheme was founded on a calculation of the revenues of the Commission, of which the Finsbury Estate was a most important part. To abstract this would disable the Commission from fulfilling their pledge. But upon what ground did the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets rest his claim for the metropolitan districts? He would ask, whether the claims of the metropolis had been disregarded, or the rules of the Commission violated? If the Commissioners had neglected their duty, it was for the Government to exert its power and control over that body, and redress the grievance, instead of leaving the matter to the chance efforts of a private Member. But supposing he was wrong in his interpretation of the duty of the Government, how did the facts stand? He would refer to the words of the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of London, who was a member of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and not one of the least zealous members of that body, while he certainly was not inactive in putting forward the claims of his diocese to the public at large. In his charge, delivered in December last, the right rev. Prelate stated that in the four preceding years the sum of £530,000 had been appropriated from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission for the relief of spiritual destitution in his diocese, which, it must be borne in mind, did not include all the metropolitan districts, for a large sum was also distributed in Southwark. This was nearly one-sixth of the sum total distributed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners during the period referred to, and the population of the metropolitan districts being 3,000,000, was about one-sixth of the whole population. The metropolis had therefore received its full share of the total fund distributed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The hon. Gentleman, however, proposed to abstract from the common fund £1,000,000, the effect of which would be to disable the Ecclesiastical Commission from carrying out the system of rules established in 1864, and sanctioned by the House. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. LEE MAN said, that the locality with which he was connected had not at present derived any special benefit from the Ecclesiastical Commission; but he could not help thinking that they would have still greater reason to complain if the Commissioners had not resisted a measure so unjust as that which had been proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. The Bill was unjust to those other portions of the country from which came the emoluments which now formed the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commission. He could see no difference between the prebend represented by the hon. Gentleman and other prebends in other parts of the country whose incomes had been absorbed in the common fund. In the cathedral church of York, for example, a large number of prebends had been absorbed, and in what particular did they differ from the prebend of Finsbury? He regretted the interpretation put by the Commissioners upon the word "place." Its not being construed to include "parish" had had the effect of excluding the poorer parishes in the city of York from participation in the funds of the Commission. In that city there was at the present moment no fewer than ten livings, the emoluments arising from which did not amount to more than £100 per annum each. [MR. AYRTON: And what is the population?] He could not exactly say, but those parishes were in the poorest portions of the city, which had a population of nearly 50,000. Now, while they had but little reason to be grateful to the Commissioners in regard to the past, still they had been relying on the establishment of the common fund, and believed that the Commissioners were honestly endeavouring to distribute it. In due course, no doubt, they would receive their share along with the rest of the country. If this Bill were carried, what was there to prevent his asking the House to deal with the city of York on account of special circumstances, and to exempt it from the rule adopted by the Commissioners? As to the propriety of that rule he could not understand what other principle could have been adopted by the Commissioners, if their object was to augment livings in destitute parts of the country. The portions of the country which had contributed the least to the common fund were just the places which required the most augmentation. The diocese of Ripon, for instance, was carved out of the old diocese of York, and therefore contributed nothing to this common fund. The diocese of Ripon comprised the greater part of the West Riding, including Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, indeed most of its large manufacturing towns, and for the relief of its spiritual destitution it had received out of the common fund £750,000. If this measure were adopted, and its principle acted on, whence would the Commissioners obtain funds to distribute? For twenty years the diocese of York had received at the rate of £16,000 a year, the aggregate being no more than London was stated to have received in four years. In the adjoining diocese of Durham there were large emoluments, the surplus of which received by the Commissioners had been by them honestly applied to meet local claims; but other parts of Durham were unprovided for, although the surplus revenues would have been ample for the purpose if they had not become absorbed in the common fund. But what were the Commissioners to do as to other places requiring grants if the money they had hitherto received were diverted from them? The Commissioners had looked at the wants of the clergy as a whole and had endeavoured to appropriate their funds fairly. Believing that the adoption of the principle of the Bill would have the effect of obstructing the Commissioners in the beneficial course they had been pursuing, he seconded the Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Howes.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, it seemed to him that the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment had justified the course which they had taken on very different grounds. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Howes) said the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had acted well, and ought not to be interfered with; the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) said they had behaved very ill to the city he represented; and so he was willing that they should be whipped across the back of London, not much minding whether some of the blows fell on that place. But the Commissioners were not on their trial, and he did not understand the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets to say that they were. The question before them was a matter of principle, raised by a grave and exceptional case. No doubt the Commissioners had proceeded, since their first institution, on a general rough-and-ready course of equalization; but things were so anomalous thirty-five years ago, that a rough-and-ready system of remedy was indispensable. So they went on doing a great deal of good by an infinite series of small injustices. But these injustices at length became so flagrant, that there was a cry raised in the different localities that their claims for first consideration were of such paramount character that they ought not to be disregarded as they had been theretofore, and hence had come that alteration of system which his hon. Friend appealed to. For the last few years the system of the Commissioners had been to consider local claims as they had not been previously considered. Now, just at the crisis of this change of system came into the field that enormous windfall, the Finsbury Ecclesiastical Estate, which had been for years upon years a bye-word of reproach among those who wished ill to the Church, and of regret to those who wished to see her money distributed to the best advantage. The property had long been looked upon as money that might be utilized for the spiritual wants of the metropolis when it fell in. It had fallen in; and, individually, both as a member of the Bishop of London's Fund, and as a resident in the capital feeling a warm interest in the spiritual welfare of London, he felt bound to move. This windfall, according to the hon. Mover's authority, was £48,000 a year; according to that of his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, of £60,000. If so, it stood to reason that the half which would be left to the Commission would be proportionately increased. The hon. Member for Norfolk said an attempt had been made to wrest this estate from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and convert it into a fund for the benefit of the City of London. He was astonished to hear that an ecclesiastical estate, an ancient prebend of the Cathedral of St. Paul, London, could be said to be diverted from its proper purposes because it was to be devoted to the spiritual destitution of the City itself. Here was this Finsbury property which had been from time immemorial property granted to the Church. For what? For the performance of the spiritual duties of one clergyman in the Cathedral of St. Paul. Well, in the flux of time the property had become so enormously enhanced in value that it could support scores of clergymen instead of the one original prebendary. And what, under the circumstances, was asked? Not that the Finsbury property should be devoted to London; but that one-half should be devoted to it, and the other half go to the common fund which had done so much good all over England. The hon. Member for Norfolk took exception to the statement that the property was worth £40,000 a year, and said the amount was nearer £60,000. If this were true, so much the better for the cause he advocated; for in that case it would be £30 which would go to all England. The residue would be reserved for London; but in so doing it would pro tanto free the common fund which would, in proportion, be exonerated from having to help London. It had been asked, why not be satisfied with money out of the common fund? Why insist on marking the money "Finsbury money?" Well, there was a feeling, he thought a healthy feeling—certainly a strong one—common to all mankind, which liked to be able to identify one's property, as applied for one's own use. It was this feeling that made London like to know she was using her own money to meet her own religious wants, rather than be dependent on an impassive Lady Bountiful in the shape of a general Commission. The Bill asked for only £24,000 a year. The whole money was raised in Finsbury, and it was proposed to spend a portion of it in London. A more reasonable proposition he could hardly imagine. At the same time, he desired not to pledge himself to the details of the measure as it stood. It was somewhat rough-hewn and restrictive in its provisions. Still, it had got hold of the right view in its main principle. The Church of England felt that men were necessary as well as churches, and what was wanted in the Church was an amount of elasticity she did not at present possess. The Church of England was moulded into her present shape ages ago when towns were few, and not populous, and so she became too exclusively parochial. He was glad that a wider and broader view had at length been taken, and that the necessity of men working in towns out of the mere parochial system, but if it might be in concert, had been recognised. So far from carping at and opposing this measure, he thought the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would only do justice to their office, and gain credit and confidence for themselves, by coming forward open-handed and welcoming heartily a scheme which would enable them to confer a boon on London which, God knew, was in want of the most earnest and self-denying exertions of those who loved God and wished to bring the population, particularly those at the East End, to a sense of virtue, wholesome learning, and the knowledge of their duty to God and to men.

MR. POWELL said, he felt an earnest desire that the benefit of the common fund should not be diminished, but that the country at large should continue to derive advantage from it. It was with some astonishment that he heard the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton) remark that the wealthy districts had been favoured to the exclusion of the poor districts. In the course of the last Session he moved for Returns showing the conduct of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with reference to the augmentation of benefices and the creation of new parishes in the metropolis. It appeared that Bethnal Green received augmentations with regard to ten churches; Lambeth, seven; Southwark, four, and Charterhouse several. He was confident that those who would carefully peruse the list would arrive at the conclusion that ecclesiastical poverty had been greatly relieved by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. A remark had been made that the effect of the augmentation grants had been to increase the saleable value of the private patronage of livings. Such increase must necessarily be of a most trifling character. He would, nevertheless, meet the objection, slight as it was, by passing a short Act, somewhat analogous to that relating to the Lord Chancellor's livings, preventing any sale for a period of twenty years. This would be just, would inflict no hardship, and would entirely remove objection. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1864 made an elaborate reply to charges brought against them. He would not read its numerous details; but he would make one observation in reference to a financial statement of Mr. Alderman Copeland, and that was that the worthy Alderman had drawn up a balance-sheet, in which he had placed on one side a host of entirely exceptional charges; while on the other side there was only the ordinary annual receipt. With reference to a remark of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Beresford Hope), he would remark that the Finsbury Estate was no more to London than other estates were to the localities whence the funds proceeded. If London was populous it was also wealthy. Its ecclesiastical wealth was exceptionally large, and the sale of the City churches was producing a sum of money which he hoped would not be consumed by a wasteful expenditure. If London had her 3,000,000 of inhabitants, the rest of the country had 17,000,000. Liverpool had her 500,000; Leeds, Bradford; Birmingham, Manchester had large populations, but no large amounts of ecclesiastical property; and if his hon. Friend wished to abate crime and pauperism in London, he (Mr. Powell) said crime and pauperism were not confined to London, and he wished to abate crime and pauperism all over the country. If it were permitted to any Member to speak of his personal experience, he could say that he had witnessed the happiest results arising from the expenditure of the common fund in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He had known many clergymen, whose livings would not amount in value to the incomes of domestic servants, become possessed, by the operations of the Commissioners, of an income of £300 and a parsonage. Since the adoption of the scheme of 1864, £3,500,000 would have been appropriated in three distinct classes of cases up to the end of 1868. Of this, £2,000,000 would have been applied in increasing endowments in populous places; £1,000,000 in satisfying local claims; and £500,000 in meeting sums contributed as private benefactions. During five years nearly 1,000 livings would have been raised unconditionally to £300 a year, and 800 more would have been augmented by the meeting of private benefactions, which had amounted to £1,300,000 or £1,400,000. The money proposed to be given in the case of Durham was to meet efforts made by Durham, and therefore did not form a precedent for this Bill. The proposal of the hon. Member did not contemplate the cases of benefactions, and would arrest their flow into the coffers of the Commissioners, thus depriving the Church of great benefits already curtailed by the want of funds to meet private munificence. The details of the Bill were open to objection, especially in that they would place curates and incumbents in the power of the Bishop, and so deprive them of the independence they had hitherto enjoyed, to the advantage of themselves and of the Church.

MR. LOCKE said, that he had learnt for the first time that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had done as much for Southwark as the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Powell) had intimated. The Bishop of Winchester, who was the Bishop of the diocese, appeared to be equally in ignorance on the point, for his Lordship had found it necessary to start a Church Extension Fund for the purpose of alleviating the spiritual destitution in the Borough. Among the many illustrations that had been given of the necessity for this movement he might instance the case of St. Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey, with a population of 23,000, which had one church, with a rector and two curates, and school accommodation for 720 children; St. James's, with a population of 19,400, one church, one incumbent, no curate, and school accommodation for 550 children; St. George's, Southwark, population 26,300, one church, with a rector and four curates; St. Mark's, Kennington, population 21,000, one church, an incumbent and two curates. He was not aware that anything had been done by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to meet these cases; indeed, the course they adopted was obviously a fallacious one, since aid was only given to those who were in a position to help themselves. The case of the Church of St. Stephen's, Kent Street, in the borough of Southwark, was notorious, and had been immortalized by Mr. Dickens as an instance of the assistance poor parishes received from the Commissioners. The whole population of this parish was merged in poverty. Application for aid had been made over and over again to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but the answer invariably was—"You are so extremely poor that we can do nothing for you. You have really nobody to help you; you have no chance of being able to get up a fund to build a church; therefore, the funds at our command cannot be appropriated to you, because you are in greater want of them than anybody else." Who, he asked, had risen in that House to defend the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? His hon. Friend (Mr. Howes) said that he was himself an Ecclesiastical Commissioner, but that he came there without any authority to speak in the name of the body to which he belonged, though, speaking unauthoritatively, he repudiated whatever compact was, or was supposed to have been, entered into by the Commissioners last year. But who had said a word in favour of the body? His hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Beresford Hope) had, indeed, appeared to some extent as their advocate; but the best thing he could discover to say in their behalf was that they had collected their funds by the commission of a complete series of "small injustices" throughout the country. Not a very pleasing view of spiritual things. They now proposed to make a variation in the monotony of their usual course, by committing a great injustice. They wanted to put into their pockets £60,000 a year, without binding themselves in any way as to how they were to deal with it. They were to have this enormous addition to their resources without any guarantee that a single shilling of it would be spent in relieving the spiritual distress of the metropolis, although at this very moment the Bishops of London and Winchester were each actively engaged in raising a fund to meet the appalling religious destitution that prevailed in London. On the last occasion when this Bill was before them they were told to wait; that the fund had not yet fallen in; that they were too soon. The right hon. Gentleman who was then Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir George Grey) said, "Wait till next year. Read your Bill now a second time. The principle of it shall be admitted next year. The fund shall be disposed of for the benefit of the spiritual destitution of London." The time was now come, and they were met by an unauthorized member of the Ecclesiastical Commission who, while professing not to oppose the Bill on behalf of that body, did really oppose it, and spoke of what the Commissioners had done and not done elsewhere with money taken from other places. But was it not obvious to the plainest capacity that the argument that the money should be devoted to the spiritual necessities of the locality contributing the revenue applied most strongly of all to the case of London? The interests of all parts of London were inextricably interwoven with each other; the poverty of one district was created by the wealth of another district. Therefore, on the principles acknowledged and acted on throughout the country, £30,000 a year at least out of this annual income of £60,000 a year ought to be appropriated to relieve the spiritual wants of the metropolis. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) had argued that because the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had spent none of their resources in that ecclesiastical city (from which large sums had been derived), therefore no special claim could be sustained, on the part of the metropolis, to enjoy the benefit of any portion of this £60,000 a year. What analogy was there between the two instances? The reason why nothing was given to York was simply this—that York wanted nothing. It had its cathedral, with heaven only knew how many prebends, who perhaps might be supposed, without any very violent presumption, to do something, and not be mere shams, as a distinguished clergyman had once called them. Of course, there were many estimable and active men holding those positions. But it was said there were in York ten clergymen receiving only £100 a year, and yet nothing had been given to it. But the hon. Member did not state how many clergymen there were in York, besides these ten, who received ample stipends. Considering the population of that place—40,535—

how could it be urged that there was spiritual destitution there. The city was full of clergymen; you could not walk in the streets without stumbling on them; yet it was to be gravely argued that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners ought to have made grants to that city. Because the city of York was not allowed to have all the money derived from the cathedral of York, it was contended that the cases were analogous; and London, with its vast spiritual destitution, ought not to have any portion of this large ecclesiastical revenue. Four or five years ago the Commissioners dreamt a dream—were they to be allowed to realize their expensive visions at the cost of other people? The question really before the House was this—was there spiritual destitution in the metropolis? Were not the public being called upon to pay contributions towards this object? Had not the funds hitherto been found insufficient, and would it not be a robbery of the poor of London if this large sum of money were now to be taken away and distributed over the country at large?

MR. GOLDNEY said, that at a time when the public were being pressed by two Bishops to contribute money towards the relief of the spiritual distress of London they would naturally ask why this large sum of £60,000 a year, which would go far to meet the existing want, and which proceeded from local sources, should be withdrawn from its natural and proper object to be dissipated in isolated grants throughout the country. The supporters of the Bill had shown the utmost moderation and fairness in their proposals. They did not ask that any permanent increase in the livings of the metropolis should be made out of this fund; but only that it should go to the support of curates who would actually do the work that was required in districts in London where there was great spiritual distress. The fund would not even be withdrawn from the control of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but they would merely be required to appropriate a certain portion of it, under the supervision of the Bishop, for the benefit of the metropolis. He trusted that any rate the Bill would be allowed to go to a second reading.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that the Finsbury Estate had been held by the corporation about 500 years; but by some means it had fallen, or was about to fall, out of their hands. His constituents were of opinion that as they built the houses and contributed the money which was now in question, a considerable portion of it ought to be spent at home. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners were a body created by Parliament, and were subject to the control of Parliament, and he hoped the House would direct them to expend the portion of the fund referred to in the Bill in the manner therein prescribed.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought that in dispensing capitular revenues the particular localities in which those revenues arose should have some consideration. He knew that this interference with the common fund was unpalatable to the Commissioners, who always insisted that the particular district must rely upon their generosity in administering the common fund. But in the Act of 1860, Parliament had evidently intended that the word "place" should be used in a broad sense, and had favoured the doctrine that consideration should be shown to localities whence the funds were drawn. The speech of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) really told for this Bill, because if York could show a local claim the principle of the Bill would apply there also. Of all the English counties none had suffered more from the action of the Ecclesiastical Commission than that in the midst of which his constituency were placed—namely, Cumberland. The local claims had often been represented to the Commissioners, but without effect; and it was on account of its regard for local claims that he supported the Bill. In London, St. Paul's Cathedral was an instance of the neglect of the Commissioners to fulfil their manifest duty. From a Return which he had obtained in 1865, showing the receipts and expenditure of the cathedrals and collegiate churches, it appeared that out of seventeen clergy attached to St. Paul's twelve received only a pittance of from £40 to £50 a year exclusive of fees. They were, therefore, driven to depend for their stipends upon these fees which were taken for showing the Cathedral—a system which was a scandal and disgrace to the Church of England. An end had been put to the twopences which used to be charged for admission; but a great part of the clergy and the vicars-choral divided the fees received from visitors for viewing the cupola and the funeral car of the late Duke of Wellington, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should apply a portion of the surplus Cathedral funds in doing away with these church exhibitions. The principle of the Bill before the House ought to commend itself to every one on that side of the House; because it acted upon the principle that all the property which was for the benefit of the Church ought to be applied, as far as possible, in accordance with the intentions of the founders, and to carry into effect such of the trusts by them created as would prove of public benefit at the present time. He should therefore support the second reading.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to call attention to an article which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette of yesterday, from the pen of the Rev. Isaac Rogers, respecting the state of the parish of St. Matthias, Bethnal Green. He had never read a more painful description than the account of the spiritual destitution prevailing in the district from which this income pertaining to the Finsbury property arose. It was not proposed to take away funds which had come into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but simply to deal with a portion of the revenue which they might otherwise claim. It was a monstrous thing that the Church revenue should be carried away from that district to other places, at a time when there was such an awful amount of spiritual destitution which required relief.

MR. HENDERSON said, he hoped the House would not sanction the exceptional appropriation of funds to local purposes which the Bill contemplated, the principle of such appropriation never having been acknowledged. If any district or diocese had a prior claim to such an appropriation from the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it was the diocese of Durham, which contributed fully one-fifth of the total revenue of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that large sum being mainly raised from the mineral and coal mining districts. If any appropriation were made, surely the mining districts of Durham would be entitled to some consideration; and with the view of obtaining such a provision a deputation waited upon Lord Palmerston, in 1860, to endeavour to have a certain sum appropriated from the money paid from Durham to the spiritual wants of that district. All, however, that they could get was an acknowledgment that the wants of their district should have more consideration than they had hitherto had. He thought the House would not sanction the exceptional legislation with regard to Finsbury which had been denied to Durham. The appeals of the Bishops of London and Winchester were cited; but Durham likewise was making efforts to raise a fund of £40,000 to meet local spiritual wants. It would not be an act of justice to the country at large to distribute the fund as proposed, while the country contributed so largely to the Ecclesiastical Fund, and he hoped the House would reject the Bill.

MR. BRUCE said, he must admit that the spiritual destitution of the metropolis could not be overstated, or the strong necessity of measures for supplying not only the religious but the sanitary and the educational wants of the London poor. That question was not one of interest merely, but of danger, for it was impossible that these masses of population, increasing from year to year, should continue in their present moral and social condition without danger to the State. But, then, the House must in fairness consider also the condition of the people in Yorkshire and Staffordshire, not forgetting the poor Welshman. Once make this inroad upon the principle hitherto adopted in dealing with these funds, and they could not stop there, for they would soon find equally strong claims urged from other places. It was for Parliament to consider whether the principle on which the Commissioners had hitherto distributed the funds was a wise principle; if it was, Parliament ought to maintain it; if it was not, they should deal with the question by some general measure. It would be impossible to pass the Bill without making an inroad on that principle. Up to this time the revenue from the metropolitan district was about one-fifth of the whole receipts of the Commission. Deducting a portion which was derived from the country, it might be broadly stated that the Commissioners had one-sixth of their revenue from the metropolis, and that exactly represented the amount spent by them upon the metropolis. During the last three years the exact amount capitalized, spent upon different parts of England, was £2,400,000; and during that time the amount spent in London alone was £400,000, or one-sixth. London, therefore, had not been less favoured in proportion to its population than other parts of the country. Then, again, the Finsbury Estate had been vested in the Commissioners for ten years, and during that time every farthing of the income, which varied from £7,000 to £9,000 a year, had been spent in endowing districts subsidiary to St. Leonard's and St. Luke's, and supporting clergy there. But next year this £9,000 would be increased by the large sum of

£60,000, and the hon. Member for Tower Hamlets proposed to apply £30,000 of that by this Bill to that district, in addition, he supposed—for there was no provision to the contrary—to what the district might derive from the fund in its ordinary course. In his own parish, which had increased during twenty years from a population of 4,000 to a population of nearly 40,000, there was a perpetual curacy with a fixed income of something under £200 a year, and it was clear that it must be from some other fund that the spiritual destitution of the district should be provided for. He doubted exceedingly the propriety of interfering with measures which had acted with so much advantage to the Church and the country during the last few years. It had been the object of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to increase the value of the livings where there was a large population. Last year they dealt with cases of districts containing 5,000 people, raising the value of such of those livings as were under public patronage to £300 a year. This year the Commission proposed to deal with all cases where the population numbered 4,500; next year they proposed to deal with livings where the population was 4,000; and if they were allowed to distribute the funds at their disposal to the best of their judgment for the benefit of the whole country, they would by-and-by give the same advantages to livings where the population was smaller. The fact was, it was impossible to consider this subject with reference to London alone. In considering the question, they should take the case of the manufacturing districts, of Manchester for instance, the centre of a population of nearly 1,000,000, but where the ecclesiastical revenue expended was smaller than almost in any part of the kingdom. One argument had been used in support of the Bill which must have made a great impression on the House. It was said, in the case of private patronage, that the assistance of the Commissioners was given only when it was met by benefactions on the part of the patrons; and, therefore, if from peculiar circumstances of patronage and property in London no such benefactions were forthcoming, no funds could be got from the Commissioners. What he would suggest, in order to meet that difficulty, was this. At present the Commissioners had power to make grants towards the support of curates in the mining districts. He did not recollect at that moment why the exception had been made in the case of those districts, but it had been made, and he would suggest to extend the precedent so that the same principle might be applied to other populous places. He asked the hon. and learned Gentleman to suspend the second reading of the Bill for some time, and communicate with the Secretary of the Home Department (Mr. Walpole), who would not, he believed, from what he knew of the right hon. Gentleman, object to enter into negotiations with him on the subject.

MR. HENLEY said, it was impossible to approach this subject, which was full of difficulty, look at it in whatever way they would, without expressing a strong feeling with regard to the vast amount of spiritual destitution which existed not only in the metropolis, but, unfortunately, in many other parts of the country. But the question the House had to consider was whether, in dealing with a fund which, however large, was very limited, considering the great amount of destitution with which it had to deal, they were to yield to appeals made upon special grounds in favour of certain localities, or to support a system of distribution which should be just to the whole suffering community? He could not help feeling that the principle of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman would be fatal to any general and just distribution; because if the measure once passed district after district would make special applications, and the floor of that House would become the battle-field of claims each of which, standing alone, would excite sympathy and deserve relief. Now, throughout the debate he had not heard it asserted that London had not received its fair share. Figures to the contrary had been given. But the fact appeared to be that, because a large sum was about to come into the hands of the Commissioners, a great rush was made to get relief from it. The hon. Member for the City had said it was not proposed to take anything from the Commissioners, but only to prevent something coming into their hands. Now that might be true in terms, but the argument was not a good one. For what had happened? The Commissioners a few years ago, knowing the valuable reversionary interests which were about to come in, drew up a scheme in which they pledged themselves to deal with all places through the length and breadth of the land that came within certain conditions which they laid down. But if by the present Bill the House took from them a sum which, according to the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Howes) was equivalent to £1,000,000, how were the Commissioners to carry out their scheme? There might be certain cases that the Commissioners should be enabled to deal with specially; but he could not support the second reading of this Bill, because if once the principle were admitted they could not stop short. It would, as the hon. Member for Whitehaven had shown, have the widest possible application, and would break down the common fund, which was now conferring benefits which were being felt by the whole country.

MR. HADFIELD said, this question was a most interesting one. The Church had £6,000,000 a year and upwards, and yet they heard of spiritual destitution of the most awful kind in all parts of the country. In speaking of destitution, it seemed that Nonconformists were included in the lists of the destitute. Why, the Nonconformists in England had 25,000 places of worship, but that was not recognised. The House never heard of the Nonconformists having any disputes about their internal affairs. The right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Bruce) had referred to Wales; but would he tell the House that Wales was destitute of religious instruction. The Nonconformists there had spent £2,000,000 in the erection of places of worship, and had but one endowment of £25 a year. The fact was that three-fourths or seven-eighths of the Welsh were Nonconformists. But care was taken that the spiritual destitution of any district in Wales was properly looked after; and the same course ought to be followed by the Church of England, without appealing for extraneous aid. With regard to Scotland, twenty-three years ago there was a secession. The religious feeling of the country was outraged by an attempt at dictation. The Free Church was established, and that Free Church had raised since then £7,000,000 for its support. Its clergy were better paid than those of the Established Church in that country. What was the case with respect to Ireland? Was it not enough to rouse the feelings of any man that in Ireland there should be maintained, united with the Church of England, a State Church which had only one-eighth of the population adhering to it? What was the cause that the House never heard anything about the other denominations, but it was all about the Church of England? The reason was because all their confidence was in endowments, and they paid no attention to what was done by voluntary effort.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that the discursive character of the discussion was completed by the remarks of the hon. Member for Sheffield. By one Gentleman they had been invited to ascend the Whispering Gallery of St. Paul's; others had taken them from Cumberland to Wales; and to complete the round, the hon. Member (Mr. Hadfield) had given them a history of the Free Church in Scotland and the state of religious parties in Ireland. But none of them had anything whatsoever to do with the Bill. His first objection to the Bill was that, though discussed as if it were an Imperial question, it was in its scope, its object, and its title, a private and local Bill. If they were about to touch the common fund for the relief of spiritual destitution in the metropolis, let it be done by a general Act and not by a Private Bill—a mere Estate Bill. Allusion had been made to the Act of 1860, which recognised local claims and made special provision for the mining districts. But what did Parliament do on that occasion? It extended to property of all descriptions the provisions applicable to local claims, which had previously attached only to tithes. It also enabled the Commissioners to make grants to meet benefactions for the purpose of making temporary provision for the care of souls in mining districts. But this mining clause was not, as had been alleged, a Durham clause—it affected the whole country. It was equally applicable to Staffordshire and to Wales, to Cumberland and to Cornwall. But this Bill related to only one property in the whole metropolis. The right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Bruce) and Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had put forcibly before the House the great importance of not infringing on the common fund. What would become of the common fund if Session after Session Parliament was asked to give its sanction to a scheme like this? His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire had shown that the income that was about to accrue had been anticipated. The fact was the Commission had been looking forward to receiving these sums. Owing to the vicious system of management of Church property before 1840 it was a long time before the Commissioners were able to realize the property

they had in their hands, and by the advice of the late Sir Robert Peel they contracted a large debt of £600,000 to the Queen Anne's Bounty Fund. The Commission ought to be judged, not by what it had done in the earlier part of its career, but what it had been enabled to do in the last two years. In 1864 a very comprehensive plan was laid down by the Commissioners, based upon the supposition that Parliament would allow the estates which were expected to come into their hands year after year to do so. It was proposed to secure for every clergyman who had charge of a population of 5,000 an income of £300 a year, and, in the course of a few years, to carry the same principle downwards, so as to make it applicable to parishes with a population of 4,500 and 4,000. But how could that be done if the money on which they relied was intercepted and prevented from coming into their hands? The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had talked as if the Commissioners could do what they liked with the money. But they were tied down to apply it to the relief of destitution in populous places, and what populous place had so good a claim as the metropolis? He had not heard any hon. Gentleman allege that the Commissioners had not given the metropolis a fair share. Two parishes in Bermondsey had received from them altogether grants to the amount of £16,640; and in eleven districts in Bethnal Green they had disposed of an aggregate sum of £71,662. If the Commissioners, during the last two years at all events, had been pursuing plans beneficial to the country, let not the House interfere with them. If the hon. Gentleman would wait he would see in a few days the Report of the present year, and what he would ask him to do was this—not to proceed with the present Bill—not to establish a bad precedent with reference to any particular property. Let him withdraw this Bill, or, if he objected to do that, let him postpone for a month or six weeks the second reading, and communicate in the meantime with the Commissioners and the Home Secretary, and see whether they could not give him a general measure applicable to the whole country, enacting that where there might be a large population the Commissioners would be bound to make special provision. They might thus be enabled to provide the most effectual remedy for the spiritual destitution which prevailed throughout the country, while they would be acting in conformity with all their previous legislation upon that subject.

MR. AYRTON said, that the three Ecclesiastical Commissioners who had spoken in the debate had not come forward with a resolution by that body authorizing the Members in the House of Commons to oppose it. If the matter had been debated in that body they would have found it expedient not to oppose the Bill. As it was, they had only ventured to oppose it in their individual capacity, and not as Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The real question, from which the attention of the House was diverted by the Members of the Commission who had addressed it, was whether the metropolis did not stand in a peculiar position, different from the rest of the country. The House had over and over again laid down the principle that in many of the circumstances of legislation the metropolis must stand alone. When the estate in question would fall in, the metropolis would have contributed two-fifths of the entire fund at the disposal of the Commission to meet cases of spiritual destitution, and then two-thirds would be derived from the results of the efforts of the working classes of the metropolis. It was only last year that the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire came forward to introduce a special exception of the worst kind into the Bill of the Commissioners, and now the right hon. Gentleman cried out against exceptional legislation. He would prefer the practice to the preaching of the right hon. Gentleman on this occasion. There had been exceptional legislation in the case of Durham and in that of the Poor Knights of Windsor, as well as for Manchester and Rochdale, two troublesome places to the Government, the latter of which refused spiritual assistance and obtained temporal assistance in its stead. York had been referred to, but the place was suffering from a plethora of clergy who were poor because there were so many of them. The Commissioners had made special arrangements in all these instances, not one of which was half so strong as the present. The propriety of his proposal was, moreover, admitted several years ago by a Committee of the House of Lords, who said that in 1866 justice would be done. As to the grants made by the Commissioners to metropolitan districts, they were most inadequate. In one of the cases which had been adduced by the opponents of the Bill there were 19,000 parishioners, who, according to the principle of giving £300 per annum to every population of 4,000, ought to have had nearly £1,500, whereas they had only received £120. Indeed, the real effect of the Commissioners' scheme was to augment livings the patronage of which was vested in private persons at the public expense. He did not desire to increase endowments unnecessarily, but he proposed to retain this fund for a particular want, and if that want should hereafter cease the money might then go to the general fund. He denied the right of the Commissioners, by putting forth a scheme five years in anticipation, to deprive Parliament of its jurisdiction when the proper time arrived. Moreover, that body had ample funds wherewith to carry out their intentions. As for the suggestion that he should defer the measure, he could not entertain it, the Bill having been read a second time last Session, with the sanction of the then Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir George Grey), whilst his successor promised that it should not be prejudiced through being postponed until this year. He trusted the House would not be led away by an appeal to selfish interests, but would listen to the dictates of justice.

RUMOURED DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE :
My Lords, reports respecting the alleged doings of Fenians in Ireland—and some of them of a very grave character—have been current throughout the town last night and this morning. Under these circumstances, the noble Earl opposite will doubtless pardon my asking, Whether there is any information in the possession of the Government which he can give to the House? I am sure your Lordships and the public will be glad to know the exact state of things in that country at the present moment.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I can so entirely understand the anxiety which the noble Marquess and your Lordships must feel with regard to the unfortunate circumstances which have occurred within the last twenty-four hours in Ireland, and I also so fully recognise to the fullest extent the duty on the part of the Government of withholding nothing from your Lordships, that though the information which we possess is only such as can be received by telegram, and is, therefore, in the highest degree meagre and unsatisfactory, I am perfectly ready to state, without reserve, all the circumstances that have come to our knowledge. Yesterday afternoon we received information by telegram that between Mallow, Valentia, and Killarney the telegraphic wires had been cut; and by telegrams subsequently received we learned that they had been repaired and that the company were regularly patrolling the line for the purpose of its protection. Last night, a little before eleven o'clock, we received telegraphic information to the effect that an outbreak had certainly taken place—we do not know in what numbers, or how far armed—but that at Cahirciveen the coast-guard station had been sacked, and that a messenger—a mounted policeman with despatches—had been shot by a body of insurgents. I am happy to say, however, that we received information this morning that, although the man had been shot at, he was not killed, but his arms and his horse were taken possession of by the mob. Our information further went on to say that great apprehensions were entertained in the town of Killarney, upon which it was said that the mob were marching. That, as the noble Marquess knows, is distant from Cahirciveen about forty miles. Killarney, at the time, was utterly unprotected; but provision for the safety of the place was made by sending instructions immediately for the movement of troops by express trains from Cork, Tralee, and also from the Curragh. We received in the course of the night three subsequent telegrams, the last of which informed us that the first detachment from Cork had arrived at Killarney, and that the second was expected there in the course of a few hours. I learned to-day from Lord Strathnairn that a detachment of 500 men were on their way from the Curragh, and had already arrived at Mallow. It is satisfactory to learn that these measures afforded great relief to the minds of the people of Killarney, and that no further outbreak has occurred, except, as we understand, that the police barrack at Kells, eight miles from Cahirciveen, was attacked by the same party which visited Cahirciveen. We have not heard that they have approached any nearer to Killarney, nor have we heard of any symptoms of disturbance in any other part of the country. It will also be satisfactory to your Lordships to know that we have arrested an officer in the neighbourhood of Cahirciveen, who when arrested was proceeding on a car to take command of the insurgents, and was taken with strongly criminatory papers in his possession. I believe that the feeling of anxiety and alarm which this sudden outbreak produced has greatly subsided. At a conference which I felt it my duty to hold last night with his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and Lord Naas, Chief Secretary for Ireland, it was decided that Lord Naas should proceed to Ireland at once, and he accordingly did so at a very early hour this morning. A telegram from Lord Strathnairn states that he goes over to Dublin by the mail to-night. I have no reason to believe that this is more than a local outbreak; at the same time, notice has been given in every direction that the utmost vigilance is to be exercised. Instructions have been given to the General commanding the district and to the Admiral upon the station, to be on the look-out, and the Government will neglect no precautions that may be necessary to crush this apparent rising before it goes further. This is all the information that I am able to lay before your Lordships. It is all the information which has been received up to a late hour this afternoon, and further than that no means exist at present of obtaining information. I trust, however, that the measures taken will prove sufficient to put this mad insurrection down. It is most satisfactory to know that in no other part of Ireland is there the slightest appearance of outbreak, or of any sanction having been given to these proceedings.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE : I am anxious to learn from the noble Earl whether he is of opinion, or can form any opinion, that these insurgents or invaders came from the direction of the sea? The reference which the noble Earl has made to the Admiral upon the station leads me to ask whether it is probable that these people approached Cahirciveen along the common roads of the country or from the sea coast?

THE EARL OF DERBY : I have given your Lordships the whole of the information I possess. The occurrences have only taken place within the last twenty-four hours, and the intelligence being forwarded by telegraph, we cannot at present obtain further information than that which I have already detailed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 4.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved. "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Derby.)

EARL STANHOPE said, he would take the liberty of repeating the suggestion he made last summer before the accession to office of the present Government. He then expressed to the Earl of Clarendon his opinion that the appointment of a single Commissioner from the House of Commons would hardly do justice to the subject. His suggestion was last year received with much favour, but a practical difficulty prevented its being carried out at the time. Now, however, he believed the difficulty was removed, and he begged leave to renew his suggestion that at least two efficient Members of the House of Commons be appointed Commissioners under the provisions of the Bill.

LORD LYTTELTON said, he believed the Bill would be highly beneficial as a whole; but it was capable of improvement in some of its details.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that this was the same Bill as the one of last Session, which was introduced by his noble Friend the Earl of Clarendon, and he had brought it forward early, in order that it might be thoroughly considered. He thought it best to send the Bill to the House of Commons in precisely the same condition as it was passed by their Lordships last year; but he entirely concurred in the suggestion of his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope), that there should be two Members of the House of Commons in the Commission who should be so selected that they might represent the different parties in that House. He had not yet had an opportunity of consulting his noble Friend the Earl of Clarendon; but when they had selected the names and learned that they were willing to accept the office, he would mention them to the House. Of course, they would retain in the Commission all the names which were now in the Bill.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

RUMOURED DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN said, that he had a Question on the notice paper relating to the inspection of weights and measures in Ireland; but as the noble Lord the Chief Secretary was not in his place, he would defer his Question. He would, however, take that opportunity of suggesting that some Member of the Government should give the House some information respecting the very serious occurrences which have taken place in Ireland during the last few hours.

MR. WALPOLE: I think, Sir, that on all occasions, when a Question is to be put in Parliament in reference to occurrences like this, about which there have been so many rumours throughout the metropolis to-day, the duty of the Government is to communicate to the House all such information as it properly can communicate. I will therefore briefly state what, as far as the Government know, has happened in Ireland. Early in the afternoon of yesterday we received intelligence that the wires had been cut between Mallow, Killarney, and Valentia. Later in the afternoon we received intelligence—undoubted intelligence—that the wires which had been cut had been repaired, and that some servants of the company were watching and guarding them. No further intelligence reached us till eleven o'clock yesterday evening. About that hour we received intelligence that an attack had been made upon the coastguard station, or the police-station, about eight miles from Cahirciveen, and that an orderly had been shot at. This intelligence was received late yesterday evening; and upon that intelligence being received, it was determined on the part of the Government that my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland should go over to Dublin the first thing this morning. That he has done, and that will account for his absence from the House to-night. The Bills therefore of which he had given notice for to-night will be postponed to Monday next. This morning further intelligence was communicated from Dublin, to the effect that the orderly who had been shot at had not been killed, but that his horse and his arms had been taken from him. The report went on to state that armed parties were marching upon Killarney, and that one of the supposed Fenian chiefs, calling himself Captain Moriarty, had been arrested on a car as he was on his way to Cahirciveen. He had upon him, as I understand, letters which implicated him in this matter. The intelligence went on to state that troops had been sent for from Tralee, from the Curragh, and, I think, one company from Cork; and that some of them would have been at Killarney early this morning, and all of them early in the day. The same telegram brought also the information that there were no reports of any movement in any other part of Ireland; and therefore there is every reason to believe that, through the precautions taken by the Government there, whatever that movement may have been, it probably has been brought to an end by the time at which I am now speaking. These are the circumstances of the case, and I have thought it right to state the facts to the House.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL: I should like to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether, after what has occurred during the last few days, they will be prepared to re-consider the resolution announced at the opening of Parliament, and which the Irish Attorney General has recently stated to have been come to by his advice and upon his responsibility, respecting the discontinuance of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland?

MR. BAGWELL: It has been reported also that two or more steamers have landed parties from America at Valentia, and we shall be very glad to know whether there be any truth in that report.

MR. WALPOLE: I can only say that I have no intelligence of it, and I do not believe it. With regard to the other question, respecting the Habeas Corpus Act, the hon. Gentleman cannot expect the Government to answer it at present.

JAMAICA — LEGAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR JERVIS asked, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the recent arrest in London, by the civil power, of two officers of Her Majesty's service, in consequence of a court martial recently held in Jamaica; whether, taking into consideration the grave and responsible duties imposed upon officers of the Army and Navy by the legislative enactments passed for the regulations of these services, and the result of the inquiries instituted by the War Department and the Admiralty with reference to the conduct of the officers of both these services during the recent disturbances in Jamaica, Her Majesty's Government purposed affording those officers who had been so arrested the fullest legal assistance?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no doubt whatever that when an officer in Her Majesty's service, obeying the commands of his superior officer, performs acts which are afterwards legally impugned, it will, of course, be the duty of the Government to defend him.

COLONIAL BISHOPS.—QUESTION.

MR. CARDWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any Bill on the subject of Colonial Bishops, or of Clergymen ordained by Colonial Bishops?

MR. ADDERLEY: The noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies will immediately introduce a Bill on the subject in the other House.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—THE RESOLUTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government will endeavour, as early as possible in this Session, to bring in a Bill which will carry out whatever Resolutions may be passed by the Committee on the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I observe that there is upon the paper another Question, of which notice has been given by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne), referring to the same subject—namely—

“To ask if Her Majesty's Government will inform the House what is the exact amount of reduction contemplated ‘in the value of the qualifying Tenement in counties and Boroughs;’ also the description of ‘other Franchises not dependent on such value,’ as mentioned in Reform Resolution No. 2,” and perhaps, with the indulgence of the House, it will be more convenient that I should answer both these Questions at once. The inquiry of the hon. Member for Nottingham, to which I shall presently refer, is caused by a misconception of the object of the Government in proceeding with the Resolutions of which I have given notice for the 25th of this month. I am ready to take on myself all blame for any misconception that may have arisen in his mind on the subject. The main object in introducing these Resolutions was that we should obtain the sanction of the House to the principles upon which the Bill, which we hope we may introduce into Parliament on Parliamentary Reform, shall be based. Our object in having recourse to such a mode of procedure was to prevent the Bill which we might bring in from being met with some Resolution of censure and condemnation, founded probably on an attack against some particular principle contained in it. Under these circumstances, I need not perhaps inform the hon. Gentleman that I am not prepared at the present moment to enter into any details of the Resolutions to which he has referred, and which express the principles on which we wish to act. In case these Resolutions of which we have given notice are passed, we shall be prepared at once to introduce a Bill founded on them; but I wish the House to clearly understand that our object in bringing forward these Resolutions was merely to come to some general understanding with the House as to the principles on which the Bill, which we hope we may almost immediately introduce, is to be founded, and that therefore we do not contemplate entering into the details to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Nottingham referred. We look upon the application of the principles embodied in the Resolutions as being part of the responsibility of Government; nor can we expect—I can hardly say we should desire—on the occasion of our moving the Resolutions, that the House should feel it necessary to originate itself any opinion on this point. All we can say is, we are perfectly prepared, if the House wishes to enter into a discussion upon the Resolutions in that manner, to meet them; but what we should prefer is that the principles involved in the Resolutions should be sanctioned, if they are to be sanctioned, by this House, and that we should be permitted in consequence immediately afterwards, or at the earliest convenient moment, to introduce in a legislative form the adaptation of those principles to the business which is before us. That, also, would be my answer to the Question put by my noble Friend, who wishes to know whether, if the House, in general Committee, passes certain Resolutions on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, we shall in good time be prepared to act upon them by presenting a Bill? I can only assure my noble Friend that the moment the Resolutions are passed not a moment will be unnecessarily lost. I should consider that to invite the House to discuss Resolutions upon a subject of this paramount importance, and, in the event of their being adopted, not to be prepared immediately to act upon them, would be disgracefully trifling with the House of Commons.

my Question. I did not ask him whether he intended to bring in a Bill to carry out the Resolutions of which he has given notice; but whether he honestly and sincerely desired to gather the opinion and wishes of the House and bring in a Bill to embody those wishes as expressed by the Resolutions of the Committee. I wish not to be told he will bring in a Bill to carry out a certain foregone conclusion of the Government; but whether he will bring in a Bill to carry out the wishes of the House. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give an answer to my Question, as it may make a serious difference in the votes to be calculated on.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not clearly understand the object of the noble Lord's second inquiry. I take it for granted that everybody who acts in this House is honest and sincere. As long as the Government conduct the Committee in which the Resolutions are moved, of course it will be their duty to act upon those Resolutions, whether they propose them or private Members propose them. I hope we may reserve to ourselves the privilege of free men, and that if Resolutions are adopted which we cannot carry out, we may decline to do so, and not follow what appears to be the object of my noble Friend—namely, act upon Resolutions which we do not approve. To that I cannot agree. I must repeat again, in the most distinct manner, that we brought forward these Resolutions as the basis of a Bill. We thought it was the only mode by which we could attempt to legislate with any satisfaction. We do not suppose that in passing them we are passing our Reform Bill. The Reform Bill must depend upon its merits. What we supposed was that by this means we should obtain for our measure a fair hearing.

MR. OSBORNE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will be able distinctly to state when he will be able to name the exact figure at which he proposes to fix the franchise.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must apologize to the House for troubling them so often. I at once say that if the hon. Member and his Friends will agree to the Resolution which will be placed in the hands of the Chairman—namely, that the qualification for the franchise shall be lowered, I shall, supported by that principle, which the House will have accepted, take the earliest opportunity of entering, in a Bill, into all the details. I think, if the House will consent to that mode of proceeding, there is no reason why there should be any delay in bringing in the Bill. It may be brought in immediately the Resolutions are passed. Therefore, we are not courting delay. The hon. Gentleman has inquired of me what are the particular new franchises we intend to propose, and what the re-adjustment of the old franchises. But though they are important considerations, these are really matters of detail for the Committee, and it is only in Committee we can satisfactorily settle them. If on these Resolutions we go into a discussion of all the minute points of that character that can arise out of the Resolutions, I must frankly confess the expectation of Her Majesty's Ministers in regard to the early introduction of a Bill will be much disappointed.

SPAIN AND CHILE.—QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is aware whether Spain and Chile have accepted the mediation of the United States, or whether he is in possession of any information leading to the hope that they will do so?

LORD STANLEY: The House is aware that a proposition has been made by the Government of the United States, having for its object the settlement of the existing differences between Spain and the South American Republics. We have not, however, heard of the acceptance of that proposition by either Government, and it is impossible to predict what may happen; but from the general tenour of the information we have received, I think there is fair ground to hope that the proposition may be accepted. At the same time, in the present state of the case, it is not a matter upon which I can speak with any degree of confidence.

MAJOR PALLISER—REWARD OF INVENTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY BAILLIE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the Government is about to award a large sum of money to Major Palliser, as the inventor of chilled iron projectiles, when it is stated in the well-known American work on Ordnance and Armour, by Hollay, page 495, that Captain Parrott had used chilled iron projectiles for iron-clad fighting during the Civil War in the United States?

GENERAL PEEL: I propose, in the Estimates we shall lay on the table next week, to include a limited sum for the reward of inventors of whose inventions we have availed ourselves; and a portion of the Vote will be awarded to Major Palliser, who, for the last three years, has devoted his time almost exclusively to the carrying out of those experiments of which we have availed ourselves. When I propose the Vote I shall fully explain the grounds on which this acknowledgment is made; and if my hon. Friend wishes to object to it he will have the opportunity of doing so; but of all the charges of lavish expenditure brought against the War Office, that of rewarding inventors too highly is the one they are least open to.

LABOURERS' DWELLINGS—APPLICATIONS FOR LOANS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any applications for Loans had been made under the Act of last Session "for enabling the Public Works Loan Commissioners to make advances towards the erection of Dwellings for the Labouring Classes;" and, how any such applications have been dealt with?

MR. HUNT said, there had been ten applications made for loans under the Act. The Treasury had made certain rules with reference to such applications, and those rules required that application should be made in the first instance to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, who were to forward the plans to the Board of Works for approval, and no money was to be advanced unless the latter Board certified that the building was suitable for the purpose for which it was intended. Ten applications had been sent in; of these, six did not give sufficient information to justify the Public Works Loan Commissioners in sending the plans to the Board of Works, and these applications had been returned for further information. Four applications had been sent to the Board of Works; and a doubt arose as to whether the plans could be certified, unless certain requirements were agreed to. The consequence was that bye-laws had been, with some difficulty, drawn up within the last few days. One application had received the sanction of the Board of Works, and had gone back to the Commissioners for their decision as to what sum was to be advanced if any advance were made. In respect of another application the Board of Works required further information; as to another, the plans were being considered; and in the fourth case the plans had been objected to. He understood that application would be shortly made for £20,000 by a limited liability company.

LOSS OF THE "NORTH."

QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he proposes to institute any inquiry into the case of the ship North, lost on the Goodwin Sands last autumn; and, if so, whether he will engage that the inquiry shall extend to the cause of the wreck in the first instance; and that, with regard to the subsequent proceedings, full opportunity shall be given to the boatmen and other inhabitants of Deal to answer the accusations made against them in the public press and elsewhere?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the Board of Trade had received from the Committee of Lloyd's a formal complaint of the circumstances attending the loss of the North. He had directed that an inquiry should take place. That inquiry had been committed to Mr. Montagu Bere, and letters had been addressed to the hon. Member and his colleague, and others interested, stating what course the inquiry would take. The inquiry would be open, and every opportunity would be given to the inhabitants of Deal to adduce any evidence they desired to give. He did not perceive that there was any occasion for extending the inquiry to the cause of the wreck; that question appeared to be in no way connected with the plunder of the vessel. If it should appear that a second inquiry was desirable it could be instituted.

TROOPS AND ARMS IN CHESTER CASTLE.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, What was the amount of Military force in Chester Castle on Friday, the 8th of February; what arms and ammunition were stored there; and whether, as reported, the troops stationed there were suspected of having been tampered with by the Fenians?

GENERAL PEEL: My hon. and gallant Friend has not given me notice of the alteration in the form of his Question, and I can only, therefore, give him from memory an account of the stores in Chester Castle. With regard to the number of troops who were at Chester on Friday last, there was only one company of the 54th Regiment consisting of two officers and sixty-five men; and one officer and thirty-three men of the permanent staff of the Militia. It is the intention of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to relieve the Guards sent down from London by a battalion of infantry, which will be quartered between Weedon and Chester and Liverpool. The number of muskets in the Castle last Friday was about 9,000 stand; there were 4,000 swords, 900,000 rounds of ammunition, and a large store of gunpowder. I have had no information whatever respecting the existence of any Fenianism among the troops; and therefore to that portion of the Question my answer must be that no report of the kind has ever reached me.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that a Lieutenant of the Royal Navy, whose commission as Lieutenant only dates from the 22nd May 1861, has been promoted to the rank of Commander by the present Board of Admiralty, over the heads of nearly 370 of his seniors, whose promotion has been for a considerable time almost at a standstill; if so, what special reasons can be assigned for so unusual a proceeding?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It is quite true that in the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers I did promote a young officer of unimpeachable character and professional reputation to the rank of commander. His service as lieutenant was between five and six years, during which he had served five years at sea. I believe that in doing so I only acted upon the principle which has been recognised by successive Boards of Admiralty for a great length of time—namely, that it is for the benefit of the naval service from time to time to promote a certain proportion of young officers. I confess that I heard with some surprise that passage in the Question which relates to this officer being promoted “over the heads” of 370 others. The hon. Gentleman has been himself a naval officer, and he must, therefore, know perfectly well that promotions in the Royal Navy from the rank of lieutenant always are, and always must be, by selection, not by seniority, and he must also know perfectly well that a large proportion of these 370 officers cannot hope ever to reach the rank of commander on the active list. I only wish to add that I think the House would infer from the Question of the hon. Gentleman that this was a single promotion. On the contrary, it was one of five promotions which were made on the same day. I am unwilling, because I think it might create misunderstanding, to enter into explanations of my reasons for making one of these five promotions. I am perfectly willing to explain my reasons for the whole of those promotions. If I were to do so now I should exceed the ordinary limits of an answer to the Question; but should the hon. Gentleman be of opinion that I have acted improperly in making these five promotions, I shall be ready at any moment to defend the course I have pursued.

General Peel

THE DISTURBANCES AT CHESTER.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the recent Fenian alarm at Chester, Whether any inquiry will be made as to the extent to which the Fenians had reason to rely on finding accomplices amongst the soldiers, police, or others in authority; whether the Government have considered the risk of any such parties failing in their duty if called upon to act in such cases; and, generally, for such information as to the nature, extent, and organization of this conspiracy as may, in case of necessity, enable the public to provide for their own protection?

MR. WALPOLE: I do not think the House will expect me to go into “the nature, extent, and organization” of the Fenian conspiracy. The only part of the Question requiring a distinct answer is that as to the existence of Fenianism among the troops. My right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War has already given a substantial answer to that question; but I may add that in the report which I have read this morning from Captain Edwards, who commanded the 54th at Chester, he expresses his opinion strongly that the rumours of Fenianism in that body of men are entirely without foundation.

SUGAR DUTIES.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: The Resolutions which I am about to propose will, if adopted, effect a great change in a very important portion of our Customs revenue. They are the consequence of a Convention into which Her Majesty entered in 1864 with the Emperor of the French, the King of the Belgians, and the King of the Netherlands, with the object of putting an end to great abuses existing in the assessment of the drawback in several countries of Europe, and establishing a drawback upon a common principle to be adopted by all those countries. In our own country I am bound to say that I believe the drawback upon refined sugar was, upon the whole, established upon fair principles, and bore an approximate proportion to the duty received upon the importation of the raw material; but it was far otherwise on the Continent of Europe, especially in the countries where the great sugar refineries existed—Holland, Belgium, and France. There the drawback was, I will not say calculated, but arranged upon a most extravagant scale; and, in fact, under the name of drawback in those three countries, practically speaking, a great bounty was furnished to the sugar refiners. The consequence of this bounty was that the sugar refiners of England could no longer compete with those of the countries I have named in neutral markets, and not only could they not compete in neutral markets, but they soon found the sugar refiners of France and the Low Countries competing successfully with them in our own markets. Under these circumstances, the sugar refining trade of this country greatly decreased, and was, in fact, fast disappearing; and at the first blush it seemed difficult to suppose that anything could be done to relieve this body of our fellow-subjects from so great a disadvantage. It so happened, however, that in time a mode of relief occurred, and in a very remarkable and significant manner. Some years ago the finances of France were not in a satisfactory state, and M. Fould, a Minister of great ability and acuteness, especially on financial subjects, having been called upon to examine the state of French finance and devise remedies, found, on examining the expenditure of the country, that there was what he properly considered a large and most indefensible expenditure in the shape of bounties to sugar refiners. The French Government, under these circumstances, placed themselves in communication with the authorities of this country. The sugar refiners of France did not attempt to defend the principle of the abuse under which their trade had flourished, but defended the practice on the ground that all other countries also, under the name of drawbacks, really supplied bounties to the sugar refiners. It was in 1862 that the French Government communicated with Her Majesty's Government, and about the time of the last Exhibition M. Rouher, the Minister of Commerce, visited this country, and had a communication with the authorities on this subject. The result of M. Rouher's visit was to convince him that the fault did not lie with England, and that our drawback was calculated on principles which bore a fair and just relation to the duties maintained on the raw material. But that was not the case with Belgium and Holland. The French Government then communicated with the Ministers of Belgium and Holland; and after a conference, they were of opinion that it was much better that all the countries interested in the trade of sugar refining should agree upon a bond fide drawback, if possible, and make a saving of the large sum which was expended under the name of drawback, but which was really in the nature of a bounty. After coming to that conclusion, the French Government caused a Conference to take place, first, I think, in Paris, and this Conference in due course led to the Convention of 1864 between the four Powers to which I have referred. The object of the Convention was to establish in the four countries a drawback upon the exportation of refined sugars which should be founded upon just and identical principles. By one of the articles of that treaty, it was agreed that experiments in refining sugar should be carried on upon a considerable scale in a neutral State. It was impossible to arrive at the conclusion which was requisite unless a process of that kind was undertaken. At the commencement of the proceedings, when this Resolution was arrived at, the foreign Governments in question were anxious that the drawbacks should be estimated upon sugar considered solely as one article, and they objected greatly to the classification which has prevailed in this country for a considerable time. But when they had thoroughly investigated the question they found it was utterly impossible to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty—which in a commercial point of view is an affair of great magnitude—without adopting the English system; their prejudices accordingly disappeared, and they did adopt our system of classification. Upon that system the experiments devised by eminent men, the head of the Customs in France and the Surveyor General of the Customs in England—Mr. Ogilvie, a distinguished member of the Civil Service—were carried on at Cologne. A considerable refinery was hired there, and experiments on a very elaborate and extensive scale were carried on upon every variety of sugar. Holland sent specimens from Java, France supplied her beet-root sugar, and England all the other samples. The experiments were prosecuted for more than a year; but though they were elaborate and costly, their result was most satisfactory, for the four Powers were enabled to arrive at a clear conclusion, according to which the drawback upon exported refined sugar in the four countries is established upon precise and similar principles. To complete these labours and carry the Convention entirely into effect, it is necessary that this scale of duties, which I am going to propose to-night, should be adopted by the Committee. I may congratulate the country on the conclusion of this very laborious business. Some of the results are highly favourable, and I think we may fairly congratulate ourselves upon them; because, while France and the other countries concerned have obtained a result which is perfectly satisfactory to themselves, and in which we also share, there are some benefits which are peculiar to England, owing to the remarkable circumstances in which England is placed. In the first place, the trade of our sugar refiners will be completely restored. They will be able to meet in neutral markets on fair terms with their natural rivals, and they will not encounter any vexatious rivalry in our own markets. In the next place, from the adoption throughout the Continent of our classification of duties, a new impulse will be given to the trade and produce of the West Indies. There are West Indian sugars which will find a market on the Continent, which they have not been able to find hitherto. And in the third place, these negotiations will lead to a very considerable reduction in the sugar duties of the other countries concerned. These are results highly satisfactory, and it only remains for me to inform the House of the effect of these arrangements upon our revenue. I hope the account I give will be perfectly satisfactory; because by the new duties which I am now going to propose it will be seen that England will obtain all the legitimate advantages to which I have referred, while our revenue will not be affected in the slightest degree. By one of the schemes proposed there would have been a considerable increase in the revenue, and an increase of duty; by another scheme there would have been a loss of about £300,000; but after further labours and arrangements a scheme was devised, and is now adopted, which really will not affect the revenue in any tangible degree. It is hardly necessary for me to explain minutely to the Committee the changes which have taken place with regard to a most important article—that of refined sugar. There is a reduction upon it of from 12s. 10d. to 12s. There is a slight reduction in one other article, and a slight increase in the third scale of the unrefined sugar; but the general result is that the effect upon the revenue is nil. This is a conclusion which, I hope, will be quite satisfactory to the Committee, as it is to myself. The subject is complicated, but I trust I have explained it with sufficient clearness, and I beg now, Sir, to move the Resolutions which I place in your hands. The right hon. Gentleman then moved the following Resolutions:—

1. That on and after the 1st day of March, 1867, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now charged on the undermentioned articles, the following Duties of Customs shall be charged thereon, on importation into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say):

Candy, brown or white, refined Sugar, or Sugar rendered by any process equal in quality thereto, and manufactures of refined Sugar
	the cwt.	0	12	0.
Sugar not equal to refined, viz.:—
First Class	the cwt.	0	11	3
Second Class	the cwt.	0	10	6
Third Class	the cwt.	0	9	7
Fourth Class, including Cane Juice
	the cwt.	0	8	0
Molasses	the cwt.	0	3	6

2. That on and after the 1st day of March, 1867, in lieu of the Drawbacks now allowed thereon, the following Drawbacks shall be paid and allowed on the under-mentioned descriptions of Sugar refined in Great Britain or Ireland on the exportation thereof to Foreign parts, or on removal to the Isle of Man for consumption there, or on deposit in any approved warehouse upon such terms and subject to such regulations as the Commissioners of Customs may direct, for delivery from such warehouse as Ships' Stores only, or for the purpose of sweetening British Spirits in Bond (that is to say):

Upon refined Sugar in loaf complete and whole, or lumps duly refined, having been perfectly clarified and thoroughly dried in the stove, and being of an uniform whiteness throughout, and upon such Sugar pounded, crushed, or broken in a warehouse approved by the Commissioners of Customs, such Sugar having been there first inspected by the Officers of Customs in lumps or loaves as if for immediate shipment, and then packed for exportation in the presence of such officers, and at the expense of the exporter, and upon Candy, and also upon Sugar refined by the centrifugal or by any other process, and not in any way inferior to the Export Standard Sample No. 1, approved by the Lords of the Treasury . . . for every cwt.	£	s.	d.
Upon refined Sugar unstoved, pounded, crushed, or broken, and not in any way inferior to the Export Standard Sample No. 2, approved by the Lords of the Treasury, and which shall not contain more than five per centum of moisture over and above what the same would contain if thoroughly dried in the stove . . . for every cwt.	0	12	0
Upon other refined Sugar unstoved, being bastards or pieces, ground, powdered, or crushed:—Not in any way inferior to the Export Standard Sample No. 3, approved by the Lords of the Treasury . . . for every cwt.	0	11	5
Not in any way inferior to the Export Standard Sample, No. 4, approved by the Lords of the Treasury : . . for every cwt.	0	11	8
Not in any way inferior to the Export Standard Sample No. 5, approved by the Lords of the Treasury . . . for every cwt.	0	10	6

MR. CRAWFORD said, he had no objection whatever to offer to the changes which the right hon. Gentleman proposed. On the contrary, they were perfectly satisfactory to him, because they would bring the duties more nearly to an equalization than before—a principle for which he had always contended in and out of the House. As far as the effect of these alterations upon trade was concerned, that would depend in a great degree upon the interpretation that might be placed upon the terms—first, second, and third classes. He would therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was intended by the use of the terms first, second, third, and fourth classes to depart in any way from the mode in which the sugars were already known as classified for the purposes of the present duties. The best feature in the change was the reduction of the duty on the finest descriptions of sugars from 12s. 10d. to 12s. There was one point upon which he wished for an answer. He found in the schedule two items—the second, one of 11s. 5d.; the third, one of 11s. 3d. The drawbacks corresponded exactly with the duties imposed. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman what was the meaning of the second item of 11s. 5d., which he did not see in the scale of duties on the imported sugars?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to trouble the Committee by many observations; but I think it my duty to rise and sustain altogether, so far as my information and memory serve me, the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. In point of fact, this is a proposal for which the late Government are fully responsible; and the right hon. Gentleman, I think, in the exercise of a very just judgment, has approved the result of certain inquiries for which we were responsible. There is only one point upon which I am anxious the House should not labour under any misunderstanding; because, in point of fact, it indicates and illustrates that approximation in the relation of friendly Powers which enables them to confer together, to concur and co-operate in joint proceedings for the regulation of their mutual interests in a manner which, I think, heretofore has been without example. So far it may be said to be realizing the interests of that kind of progress which we must all desire to see realized, and which tends so much to the benefit of mankind. But I wish to state even more openly that the merit of this proposal, which I take to be a very great merit, does not belong to the late Government, nor to the agents of the late Government; the merit of its conception belongs to the Government of France. The right hon. Gentleman was, I think, no more than just in speaking of the assiduity, the knowledge, and the skill with which the duties devolving on our revenue officers have been performed. With regard to Mr. Ogilvie, in particular, I must say that nothing can be more creditable to any public servant than the clearness of the views which he entertains and the aptitude and precision with which he sustains and applies them. There is one point on which I am desirous there should be no misunderstanding. The Convention does not impose any fetter or restraint upon the discretion of the British Legislature or on that of the Legislatures of the three other countries with regard to the use of sugar as a fiscal resource. That branch of our revenue was much too important to allow of its being placed under any such restraint. The points to which we are restrained are the points on which it is actually beneficial for us to be restrained. What I mean is that while agreeing that the duties upon different descriptions of sugar shall bear a certain relation to one another, and that the drawbacks thereon shall bear a certain relation to the duties, the stipulations of an international character are entirely relative, the absolute duties which may be imposed being subject, as heretofore, to the discretion of Parliament. I believe that that is a correct statement; but if it is not, I hope I shall be corrected. Now, besides being a great sign of international progress, this happy occasion marks, I trust, the close of a domestic controversy—a controversy in which my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) displayed, as the representative of the cause which he espoused, an ability, an amount of knowledge, and a clearness of statement that I have never seen surpassed in this House. I think, however, my hon. Friend has tonight stated the case a little too much upon his own side, for we must not forget the principle which was contended for by the Committee of 1861, as well as by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford, and the right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave)—namely, that the duty ought to vary according to the real value of the sugar, which ought to be regarded as raw material intended to undergo a further process of manufacture. That is the very principle which has now been arrived at by an investigation, carried on with all the resources which science and national funds could supply, and has received so high a sanction that I doubt whether it will ever again be upset or even assailed. I do not think any of us can view that conclusion with regret; because throughout these controversies it was impossible to contend for any other principle than that the real value of the several classes of sugar is the just basis for differences of duty, and the only object was to arrive at a just criterion for determining that value. The right hon.

Mr. Gladstone

Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that this proposal will have no effect upon the revenue. I can quite understand the sense in which those words are to be taken, and I think the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in adopting such a scale of duties as to leave matters, with regard to the amount of duty, as nearly as possible in the state in which he found them. I think, however, that inasmuch as this is decidedly a sound commercial change, and tends to bring the incidence of duty in closer relation to the value, we should derive the same advantages which we have derived in every department from everything that gets rid of a protective or differential element, and that much greater vigour will be imparted to the operations of the sugar trade under the new than under previous scales. We have from time to time in alterations of the duties endeavoured to reduce those differences. In 1864 we made a very great reduction in the scale, and there is now a further approximation to unity. I hope we have now got to a condition of things in which the enormous interests abroad and the considerable interests at home may look upon the principle of our system of duties as definitely established, and may consequently resume commercial operations free from the disturbing influences and apprehensions which must always be felt so long as uncertainty hangs over the proceedings of the Legislature.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he believed that a simpler plan might have been adopted than was now proposed. The Vice President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Cave) suggested last year that the duty should be greatly reduced, expressing his belief that a duty of a half-penny a pound would lead to so enormous a consumption as to protect the revenue from loss. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman adhered to that opinion. A plan even better than that would be to allow the privilege of refining in bond, for then the grower would produce his sugar in the most economical state he could, whereas at present he was forced to make it so as to suit the various duties. He had been informed that a patent had been taken out in France for converting sugar into hard cakes like brickbats, so as to render unnecessary the use of casks, and greatly to diminish the expense of freight. He believed there were many other modes to which growers of sugar would resort if allowed, and he had no doubt these would have the effect of reducing the price of sugar 1*d.* a pound, independent of the duty altogether. He could testify to the ability which had been shown by Mr. Ogilvie; no more able officer could have been selected for the purpose.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. Crum-Ewing) express so much dissatisfaction with the measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Having sat on the West India Committees, and having been for many years connected with the West India trade, he believed that a great point had been achieved in putting an end to the controversies between the different scales, and arriving at what promised to be a permanent understanding. His hon. Friend thought the question might have been settled in a more simple manner by a single duty; but this was not a mode which the West Indian interest thought was to their advantage. They had always contended that the duty should be levied on the quantity of saccharine matter; and he believed the West Indian interest would read the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with entire satisfaction.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, if they should agree to the Resolutions, the sugar duties would continue as they are for the next twelve months? The time was come for considering whether they should try to reduce the duty on an article of such consumption amongst the humbler classes. If they did away with the classification altogether and brought down the duty to a half-penny per pound, the increase in consumption would make up for the reduction of duty.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that hon. Members seemed determined to make use of the last opportunity left them to have a sugar debate. The hon. Member for Paisley had asked him whether he was of the same opinion that he had expressed last year as to lowering the sugar duties. He begged to tell him he was, and that whenever the state of the revenue permitted he should be happy to see these duties lowered, if not done away with altogether. Another question—that of refining in bond—had been considered by the Committee, and though in theory there was much to recommend it, in practice it was found to be quite impossible. It was contended that the simplest plan was to tax all kinds of sugar at the same rate. That was exactly what the Government proposed to do by these Resolutions. They had been asked why they put a different value on different kinds of sugar, but they did nothing of the sort. They taxed pure sugar at the same rate in every sample. This was the recommendation of the Committee. At that time the classification was based upon somewhat doubtful rules; but it had been since shown to be possible to find out the exact proportion of sugar in various samples almost to a mathematical certainty. His hon. Friend asked why the Government did not let every one make sugar just as he pleased. This was what the system of classification tended to do, whereas uniform duty would exclude the lower qualities. It was a common fallacy to suppose that every one did not make the best sugar he could. If they went to the various places of growth where duty did not enter into the question, they found the price varied as much as in this country, showing that it paid best to make sugar as good as possible, and the only reason why it was sometimes bad and sometimes good was because the best machinery and appliances could not always be commanded. The ryot of Madras and the free negro of Jamaica could not produce so good an article as those in possession of Derosne's vacuum pans. Colonial refineries seldom answered, and therefore inferior sugar was sent to this country to be refined, just as copper ore was sent to Swansea. It had been truly said that the origin of this movement was due to France, and the reason was that her system of drawbacks was so expensive to the country that the net revenue of the sugar duty, as compared with the gross, was only as 15 to 45. In answer to the hon. Member for London he begged to say that the different grades were precisely the same as those in the present classification, the names only were changed. The old names with which his hon. Friend was familiar, white clayed, brown clayed, muscovado, &c., were unmeaning and sometimes deceptive, and it was thought better to call sugars as of the first, second, third, and fourth class. This was assimilating our practice to the Dutch numbers, which were perfectly well known. The drawback of 1*l.* 5*d.* referred to sugar mixed with a certain amount of water, and if the hon. Member looked to the Resolution, he would see that sugar containing not more than 5 per cent of moisture would receive a drawback of 1*l.* 5*d.*, instead of 12*s.* If any one imported sugar in a damp state, which was practically never done except by mischance, when allowance was made, it would come in at 12s.; but if it were exported it was fair to allow a drawback of 11s. 5d. only, instead of 12s., otherwise it would be a bounty. The difference of drawback was 7d., or about 5 per cent. It was asked whether we were free to raise or lower duties. Full liberty to do so was reserved by the Convention. We might do as we liked in this respect provided we preserved the proportion between the different grades. It was not usual to publish changes of duty till they were actually in force, but in this case the result of the experiments was published in the French papers, and therefore there had been sufficient data before the trade to enable them to calculate the new duties, and he had that morning received a paper in which they were estimated to within 1d. of the actual amount. The month of May was originally fixed upon as the time at which they would come into operation; but when he was in Paris the other day he heard it stated that all the other countries were ready to begin and were only waiting for us. It was therefore thought desirable to propose the new duties as soon as possible. He heard in Paris that it was hoped the Zollverein would join in the same reform. At present the Zollverein Excise duties and drawbacks were fixed on a different principle—(namely, on the raw root), and one which caused great loss to the Governments of those countries. At all events, when the success of the present experiment was proved it was hoped that other Governments would come in and adopt the same. His hon. Friend had asked him whether the re-arrangement of duties was favourable to the British West Indies. He was sorry to say it was not, and therefore he personally rather objected to it, but it was fair and just, and moreover Her Majesty's Government had no choice as their hands were absolutely tied by the terms of the Convention.

Mr. CRUM-EWING wished to explain that he was not dissatisfied with the plan of the Government altogether. The House owed very much to the Government in regard to the question of drawbacks.

Resolutions agreed to; to be reported To-morrow.

Mr. Stephen Cave

VICE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill for abolishing the office of Vice President of the Board of Trade, and substituting a Secretary, with a seat in Parliament; and in doing so I think I need not detain the House at any length. Of late years, as many hon. Gentlemen are well aware, the character of the Board of Trade and the duties which it has to perform have very materially altered. When the Board of Trade—or, as it is more properly called, the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations—was first established, it was in fact a consultative department, to which questions relating to trade were referred as they arose from time to time, and which gave advice on such subjects to the different Departments. At that time the Board of Trade had very few Executive duties to perform, and the Office consisted of a considerable number of Privy Counsellors, presided over by a President, and, in his absence, by a Vice President, who really had nothing to do except to take the President's place when he could not attend. But, of late years a very great amount of administrative work has been confided to the Board of Trade, and of a very varied description, with reference, for example, to railways, to merchant shipping, harbours, fisheries, and many other matters; and it has now really and thoroughly become an executive Department. Last Session a good deal of additional business was thrown upon it, because the management of the foreshores was transferred to it from the Office of Woods; and another important function, formerly exercised by the Exchequer—namely, in connection with the standards of weights and measures, has also been vested in it. Under these circumstances, it was of course necessary for the Board of Trade to apply to the Treasury for an addition to its staff to meet this additional work. The application was made in a formal manner, leaving the Lords of the Treasury to authorize the appointment of the officers who were required to discharge the additional duties. On receiving that communication the Treasury replied that they thought it desirable, before sanctioning any increase of strength to the Board of Trade, that there should be an inquiry into the constitution of the Department, in order to see whether it was possible to effect any economy by a revision of the arrangements in the Office. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Board of Trade, and the Secretary of the Treasury, were appointed a Committee for that purpose; and having carefully investigated the matters referred to them they drew up an elaborate Report on the state of the Office, containing a variety of proposals. One of the most important of the alterations which they recommended was that, instead of having a President and a Vice President of equal rank and equal salaries, and both Privy Counsellors—there being no distinct separation of duties between them—instead of having two such officers, and under them two joint Secretaries, and under those two joint Secretaries again a staff for the most part consisting only of clerks, it would be a preferable arrangement that there should be one head of the Office—namely, the President; that there should also be two Secretaries, one of whom should sit in Parliament; that the office of Vice President should be abolished, and that there should be as many assistant-secretaries as were required for transacting the business of the Board. The Committee accordingly proposed that there should be a subdivision of the Office into four departments, each having an assistant secretary, —namely, one for railway matters, another for matters relating to the Mercantile Marine, another for harbours and foreshores, and another for general commercial business—with a staff of clerks under them. The effect of this arrangement would be, that the office of Vice President, with a salary of £2,000 per annum attached to it, would be abolished, and that that £2,000 would be applicable to the additions which have to be made to the lower portion of the Office. The salaries of the two principal Secretaries would remain as before at £1,500 a year, and we shall be able materially to strengthen the Department, and obtain all the assistance we require, without adding anything at all to its total expense. I mean there will be no additional expense when the arrangement is complete. It is necessary that the sanction of Parliament should be asked to the proposal for abolishing the office of Vice President, and for allowing one of the Secretaries to sit in Parliament. For this purpose I seek to introduce the present Bill, which provides that the office of Vice President shall be abolished from and after the next vacancy in it. It was not in our contemplation that my right hon. Friend the present Vice President (Mr. Stephen Cave) should be asked to resign. We certainly felt that that would be a very injudicious and improper proposal to make, and we should suffer much by losing the very valuable assistance which he is able to render. At the same time, my right hon. Friend in a very handsome manner said he was perfectly ready to place his own office at the disposal of the Government, and, if it would facilitate our arrangements, to resign immediately. That very honourable offer on his part, however, the Government thought it would not be right to accept; and I am sure the House will agree to what we propose—namely, that the office of Vice President should remain as it is under his tenure, but that in future, on its becoming vacant, it should not be filled up again, but that a Parliamentary Secretary should be appointed instead. The benefit of the saving of the difference between £2,000 and £1,500 a year will not, of course, be obtained while my right hon. Friend continues to hold the office. We do not, however, recommend this change as a measure of economy, but rather as one which will place an important Department on a much more satisfactory footing than it has been for the conduct of the public business intrusted to it. I may add that the Vice President of the Board of Trade of late years has usually held the post of Paymaster General, without any salary on account of that office. It was thought that some provision might be made for some other person performing the duties of that office; but I believe there will be no difficulty in attaching those duties to the office of the Judge Advocate General. I propose, after obtaining leave to introduce this Bill, to lay on the table the correspondence which has taken place between the Treasury and the Board of Trade, in order that the House may have the whole matter clearly before it. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill for abolishing the Office of Vice President of the Board of Trade, and substituting a Secretary with a seat in Parliament.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, such a Bill as that which the right hon. Baronet proposed to introduce had been for some time past under consideration, and that the conclusion which had been arrived at by those who had entered into the subject was decidedly in favour of a plan of the nature which he had indicated. The position occupied by the Vice President of the Board of Trade had long been felt to be an anomalous one. He had co-ordinate authority with the President of the Department, and was in no way subordinate to him. The substitution of a paid Secretary subordinate to the head of the Office would, he thought, be a much better arrangement.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for abolishing the Office of Vice President of the Board of Trade, and substituting a Secretary with a seat in Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Mr. CAVE, and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 22.]

MURDER LAW AMENDMENT BILL—
PRISONS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WALPOLE, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to murder, and for giving further protection to new-born children, said: The two Bills which stand on the paper in my name—this and another Bill to provide for carrying into effect capital punishments within prisons—are measures which are brought forward in pursuance of the recommendations of the Royal Commission which was appointed to inquire into the state of the law by which the punishment of death is inflicted on persons convicted of certain crimes, and into the mode in which that punishment is carried into execution. The House will see that the subject divides itself into two distinct branches—the law relative to capital offences, and the manner in which that law is put in force. A Bill which was brought into the other House of Parliament, and which came down to this House at the end of last Session, comprehended within its provisions both those branches; but I have deemed it right, inasmuch as the subject divides itself into two distinct parts, to deal with this subject in two distinct measures. There are some persons who are of opinion that capital punishment ought to be abolished, and that executions ought not to take place in private; whereas there are others who think that executions ought to be private, and that capital punishment should be retained. By dividing the proposals which I have to submit to the House into two parts, I thought I should be furnishing a better opportunity to both the one side and the other to take objections and to state their views upon each of these points than if I were to combine those proposals in a single Bill.

Mr. Milner Gibson

It will, perhaps, be more convenient if I state on this occasion what is the character of each of the Bills which I am about to ask for leave to bring in, rather than enter into any of those controversial points which may, and probably will, arise with reference to the expediency of abolishing the punishment of death in all cases or of maintaining it in some. Although some of the Commissioners thought it might in the abstract be wise to get rid of the punishment of death, yet they all agreed that if it were not absolutely done away with, the law with respect to it, at all events, stood in need of alteration. I see opposite to me a Member of the Commission who has taken a great interest in this question ever since he entered the House of Commons, and I believe that he and all those who desire the abolition of the punishment of death agreed that a considerable change in the state of the law was desirable. [Mr. EWART: Hear, hear!] The Commission came to the conclusion that it was advisable that heinous and aggravated cases of murder should be separated from those which are less deliberate and founded on constructive malice. The House will bear in mind that the strict definition of murder is the “unlawful killing of any person with malice aforethought;” and the malice, in the opinion of a great many able jurists, must be so express that it can be proved as a matter of fact, and not merely implied as a constructive inference from other acts consequent on the supposed wickedness of the person committing the offence. The Commissioners, in dealing with that view, point out the state of the law in several other countries with regard to murder—especially in America—and argue in favour of having the offence classed under two heads—murder in the first and murder in the second degree. The Bill founded on the Report of the Commission, and brought in last Session, was framed in accordance with that distinction. A very able debate took place in the House of Lords on the clause embracing that particular point, when thirty-eight voted in favour of the distinction and thirty-eight against it, and the Lord Chancellor, in accordance with the maxim præsumitur pro negante, withdrew the clause, and introduced another in a different form. That clause, when the Bill came down from the other House, contained the following definition of murder, which would be punishable by death:—

"No person shall, under any indictment or inquisition, be convicted or deemed guilty of murder, unless the jury by whom he is tried shall be satisfied that he intended to do grievous bodily harm endangering the life of the person whom he killed, or to do grievous bodily harm endangering the life of any person whatsoever."

On the part of the Government I had to consider whether, in point of fact, that definition would or would not carry into effect the view taken by the Commission; and also, whether there was not such an ambiguity in its terms that in many cases, assuming capital punishment still to be continued, it would not be deemed right that execution should follow. Now, I think it clear that there are several cases in which, whether according to that definition or not, you could not execute a convicted criminal; while yet they are cases in which the Commissioners intended that the capital sentence should be carried out. I will give the House two instances by way of illustrating my meaning. I will take the case of a garotter. He need not primarily intend to do bodily harm endangering the life of the person whom he assails—he may merely intend to disable him for a time for the purpose of robbing him, and the probability is that a jury would, in many instances, come to the conclusion that that was his intention. Again, let me suppose the case of chloroform being administered with the view of committing a rape. There may be in such a case no intention of doing grievous bodily harm endangering life. Now, I do not think it would be satisfactory to the community or sanctioned by public opinion that, so long as capital punishment is part of the law of England, we should not have the option of classing such crimes as those with others in which the infliction of capital punishment might be deemed to be necessary, I forebore, therefore, from proceeding with the Bill of last Session because I could not see my way to adopting the definition which was sent down to us from the House of Lords. Nor did I think it advisable to accept the line drawn by the Commissioners in classing the crime of murder into first and secondary degrees. Murder in either degree would still be looked upon as murder, and I doubt very much whether it would be rightly understood if we should endeavour to place that kind of crime under distinct heads or in different categories. The substantial object which the Commission had in view in their Report may probably be accomplished without adopting such a distinction which would not, I believe, recommend itself to the feeling of the country. What, under these circumstances, I propose to do, after due consideration, is to specify the cases of murder for which the punishment shall be capital, and, having specified those cases, to say that in all others a different punishment shall follow. The different cases of murder for which capital punishment will be inflicted, if the Bill becomes law, will be the following:—First, if any jury before whom any party is tried find that he committed the crime with the deliberate intention to kill or to do some grievous bodily harm to the person killed, or to kill or do some grievous bodily harm to some other person, I substitute the words "deliberate intention" for the words "express malice aforethought," because that is the definition of Sir Matthew Hale, and it seems to be open to less ambiguity. Secondly, capital punishment will be inflicted if a jury find that a man committed the crime with a view to, and in or immediately before or immediately after, the commission by himself of any of the following felonies:—Rape, burglary, robbery, piracy, or the felony of unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to any dwelling-house or any person therein. The third case in which the punishment of death will be inflicted is when a jury find that a man committed the crime for the purpose of thereby enabling himself or any other person to commit any of the above-mentioned felonies. The fourth case in which capital punishment will be applicable is when a jury find that a man committed the crime in the act of escape from, or for the purpose of thereby enabling himself or any other person to escape from or avoid lawful arrest, immediately after he or such other person has committed or attempted to commit murder or any of the above-mentioned felonies; and the last and fifth case for the infliction of capital punishment was suggested by the late Lord Chancellor, and it is the case with respect to which a jury shall find that a man murdered a constable or other peace officer acting in the discharge of his duty. These are the five and only cases in which, if this Bill passes into law, the crime of murder will be punished by death. The Bill goes on to provide that in any other case of murder the offender shall be liable, in the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term of not less than seven years. Such are the alterations proposed in the Bill with reference to the punishment of the crime of murder. It will be punishable by death in five cases, and in five cases only. No doubt there are some who think that the punishment of death should be absolutely abolished, and four Commissioners added a paragraph to the Report to that effect. Those hon. Members who entertain that opinion will have an opportunity to take a discussion on the subject in the simplest form when that part of the Bill shall come on for consideration. Another part of the Bill I am now asking to bring in relates to what is commonly called infanticide. I do not anticipate any great objection to this part of the measure. It is quite clear that the crime of infanticide very often goes unpunished because a conviction may be followed by capital punishment, and it is probable that a less punishment, such as penal servitude, will be more likely to secure convictions, and so operate as an increased protection to the lives of innocent infants. The only other clause to which I need refer is a restriction of the law which enabled a Judge to abstain on a conviction for murder from pronouncing judgment of death, and in that case judgment of death be recorded against the offender.

With respect to the other measure which it is my intention to ask leave to introduce, I may here state that it has for its object the carrying into execution capital punishments within prisons, and it follows very closely the recommendations contained in the Commissioner's Report. The main question which will arise in connection with this measure is whether due securities are taken for carrying out the execution with propriety, and in a manner which will satisfy the law, leaving no doubt that the execution has taken place. It is provided that certain officers of the gaol shall be present at every execution; and there is power given in the Bill to the visiting justices to authorize the admission into a prison where any execution takes place of the relatives and friends of the criminal, in order that they may see the way in which the sentence is carried into effect. The Bill requires the surgeon of the prison to certify to the death, and a coroner's inquisition is to be held after each case of execution. With all these securities it seems to me that the community may feel complete confidence as to the way in which the execution is carried into effect. Those of the Commissioners who object to capital punishment have objected also to private executions. But I cannot help thinking that the little good which results from such scenes as occur at a public execution—false heroism which the criminal puts on, and the morbid sympathy which is sometimes felt for him—constitute reasons of the strongest kind for changing the law in this respect; while the knowledge that the punishment is duly and properly and certainly inflicted will strike more terror, by way of example, than that which arises from the brutal horrors of a public execution. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to introduce a Bill for amending the law relating to murder, and for giving further protection to new-born children.

MR. BRIGHT: I was one of the Members of the Commission upon whose Report this Bill has been introduced into the House; and I cannot help saying that I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman has thought it necessary to change the form of doing that which I understand he wishes to do, and which the Commission wished to do—that is, to except a considerable number of cases, hitherto capitally punishable, from the punishment of death. The question was discussed in the Commission very fully on several occasions, and on one occasion the Commissioners came to the opinion that it would be better not to have two classes of the crime of murder. Afterwards dissatisfaction was expressed because it was believed that, leaving the crime still to be only one class, there would be great difficulty in making the real change in the administration of the law which the Commission desired. Therefore the first Resolution to which they had come was abandoned, and another Resolution was passed, after much consideration, that two classes of murder should be established. I was one of those who was opposed to the first Resolution, and who supported the decision which was afterwards arrived at. I did so on this ground—and I think the Commissioners came to that conclusion—that it was desirable that the jury should be permitted to decide distinctly this fact—whether the given crime was a murder of the first class or a murder of the second class. If it was of the first class, it would be in the position that all murders are in now, and the capital sentence would be executed unless the Home Secretary thought proper to interfere. At present there is no doubt whatever that there is the greatest possible and painful irregularity in the final determination in what cases the sentence shall be carried out. Notwithstanding that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do—as far as I could gather from what he said—exactly what I want, and what the Commissioners wanted, I do not think he does it—as far as I comprehended from the explanation which he has given us. I am glad he alters the law in this respect, that instead of that monstrous interpretation of what is called malice, which is really Judge-made law, we are to have what is described as “deliberative intention.” Assuming the act to have been committed, the jury must bring in a verdict of either murder, manslaughter, or justifiable homicide. Putting the latter out of the question, and remembering that manslaughter remains where it is, we come to murder, and that is left pretty much as it is now. The jury cannot say whether it is a murder of the first class, or whether it is a murder of the second class, and therefore is not capital. As I understood the right hon. Gentleman, the jury, if it be murder, must bring in a verdict of murder, and the sentence will be determined either by some explanatory words which the jury may add, or by the decision of the Judge as to whether there was sufficient deliberativeness to make it what I shall call a classified murder. The object of the Commission was to do something like what there is in France, though not exactly like that system. In France, the juries in general being opposed to capital punishment will bring in a verdict, in a case of murder, “with extenuating circumstances,” and in that case the crime is not capital. The Commissioners were of opinion, and I agreed with them in that opinion, that this was not a desirable thing to introduce here. It was better that the law should be more definite. At the same time, we were anxious that the law should be so fixed that every jury, in coming to a verdict, should know exactly into what list they were putting the crime and into what risk they were putting the prisoner. Unless I have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman—and I hope I have—the jury will be left almost in the position they are now in; and they will be only taken out of it by the decision of the Judge in the particular case. I should be glad to take a good many of these things out of the hands of the Judges. They are by no means infallible, and some are less wise than others. We have seen, within two or three years, one case especially, in which, owing to the course of the Judge, a man was hanged in this city whose case infinitely less called for capital punishment than many others to whom mercy has been extended. I am altogether against leaving the whole decision of these questions to these Judges. It was the object of the Commissioners to leave it to the jury; and unless the right hon. Gentleman can show that the object of the Commission in giving an absolute decision as to which list the criminal should be put in is wrong. I should be sorry to give my sanction to the alteration which he has made in the Bill which he is about to introduce.

MR. EWART said, he was very much disposed to agree with the observations of his hon. Friend who had just sat down. The two classes of murder should be distinctly defined, and should not be left to the discretion of the Judge. He had always maintained the expediency of abolishing the punishment of death entirely, and most probably he should again submit to the House a Motion to that effect. With regard to executions within the prison walls, the fact of being private would add to the interest excited in the public mind; and as the press would give every detail of the conduct of the prisoner, there was great danger lest the felon should be made into a hero. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had done well to adopt the definition of the House of Lords; but he considered with Sir FitzRoy Kelly that, resort to what contrivances they might, they never would arrive at a solution of this question without abolishing the punishment of death altogether.

MR. GILPIN said, he did not mean to oppose the introduction of a Bill which came to them on the responsibility of the Government; but he must, even at that early stage, enter his protest against the retention of the punishment of death. The subject was thoroughly understood outside the House, and the great mass of the people were disgusted to see the Legislature still discussing the propriety of putting men and women to death, whether publicly or privately, and still viewing the penalty of death as a deterrent punishment, which the experience of ages had proved the contrary. But further, they were now called on, whilst retaining the capital punishment, to deprive it of its public character, which was considered to work so well in the way of example. He believed it was a great and ghastly blunder this putting of men and women to death in order to teach others the sanctity of human life—it was discreditable alike to our intelligence and our Christianity. He believed the time would shortly arrive when, instead of tampering with the law, the House would see the propriety of altogether abolishing the punishment of death.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, as the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that there would be opportunities for fully discussing the subject on the second reading and in Committee, those who were opposed to the punishment of death would not in the least degree advance their views by opposing the introduction of the Bill. As he understood, the Bill was substantially the same as that which was brought in by the late Government last Session and passed through the House of Lords, founded on the Report of the Commission, which had paid the greatest attention to the subject and made a very valuable Report. He therefore thought the Bill should be received by the House with favour. With regard to the alteration made, it did not strike him as an improvement. Great advantage would have been secured if the division of murder into two degrees had been retained, allowing juries to decide into which class the criminal should fall; and this would have removed what was the necessary consequence of the present law—namely, the frequent interference of the prerogative of the Crown, after a review of the evidence and consultation with the Judge. The fewer of these cases the better; the more certainty in the administration of the law the better; and that certainty would have been secured in a much greater degree if the distinction to which he had referred had been retained. He did not clearly understand what part the jury would have in pronouncing to what category the criminal should belong; but it would be better to wait till the Bill was printed to see whether there was any substantial practical difference between the two proposals. With regard to the second Bill, the great argument that weighed with him in favour of executions, not strictly speaking “private,” but within the walls of prisons, was derived from the Australian colonies, where the practice was attended with complete success, while the scandal of public executions was obviated.

MR. HIBBERT believed that the country generally would cordially approve of the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman had just laid on the table—the feeling of the country had gradually become stronger and stronger on this subject. He could not help expressing his surprise at the argument of the hon. Gentleman that executions within the precincts of the gaol would not be of any value as examples. On the contrary, he thought they would be even more deterrent than when they were made public spectacles. The first execution in Manchester lately took place, and there was a concourse of 20,000 or 30,000 spectators to witness it; and there was no person in that large city whose opinion was not that executions ought to take place private, and should no longer be made public spectacles.

MR. HENLEY hoped that if the Bill passed it would rest with the jury, clear of all misunderstanding, to say whether a prisoner was or was not guilty of murder, in the first or in the second degree—that they should be made clearly to understand and pronounce of what offence they were finding a man guilty. It seemed to him that the definition of the offence was wholly changed, and he hoped that change would not lead them into the position that they should be attaching the penalty of death to a crime which was not murder according to the old definition of the term. For his own part, he was one of those who wished to get rid of capital punishment altogether. We were fast approaching that now. So much success had attended the abolition of capital punishment for various classes of offences that it was a great inducement to follow in that course, and he did not think that in cases where the extreme penalty of the law had been abolished for any description of crime it had been followed by any increase in that particular description of crime. Another reason that weighed with him was that there was at present no secondary punishment for an offence that was not exactly murder, but which was next door to it, except by inflicting the same punishment as that meted out to the man who had committed a number of repeated petty felonies—so many years’ penal servitude. He regarded that as a misfortune of the law, which he hoped would be remedied. When the Bill was before them, however, they would be better able to judge to what extent these various questions were affected.

MR. NEATE thought that the Bill did not carry out so well the intentions of the Commission as that which had been introduced by the late Government had done; but since a discretion as to the class of offence must be left somewhere he preferred to leave it with the jury. He should oppose the Bill when it came before the House for discussion.

Mr. Gilpin

Mr. BAXTER wished to know whether the provisions of the Bill were to extend to Scotland and Ireland as well as to England?

Mr. WALPOLE said, that the Bill was only intended to apply to England. As, however, there was a difference between the Scotch and the English criminal law, he thought it would be better if a separate Bill could be introduced to Scotland. In answer to the observations of several hon. Members, he had to state that it was intended in every case that the jury and not the Judge should find the "deliberate intention" to murder. The Bill is drawn up in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission, and the only case which is added to the list of capital offences is that of the murder of a policeman in the execution of his duty. If, in the opinion of hon. Members the Bill failed to carry out the intention of the framers, he had no objection to its being amended.

Mr. M'LAREN urged, in the strongest possible manner, upon the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that he should include Scotland within the operation of the Bill. The question of capital punishment had long been a question upon which great interest was excited in Scotland, and he himself, twenty years ago, had signed a petition to this House praying for the abolition of capital punishment altogether. Any modification in the law proposed for England should, he thought, be extended also to Scotland. It was a mere matter of framing two or three clauses, and he objected to the principle of passing an Act of this kind which should be applicable only to England. The Law Officers of the Crown were competent to frame two or three clauses that would be sufficient, and he hoped, therefore, that they would be introduced.

Mr. BRIGHT wished to know if the Bill would apply to Ireland?

Mr. WALPOLE said, it would; and, with regard to Scotland, he would be willing either to bring in a separate Bill for that country, or to insert such clauses in the present Bill as would be sufficient for that purpose. But upon that he must consult the Scotch Law Officers.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for amending the Law relating to Murder, and for giving further protection to New-born Children, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 25.]

PAMPHLET OF MR. R. S. FRANCE.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had received a communication from Mr. France which removed a great deal of the objectionable matter of which he had to complain when last he troubled their Lordships upon this subject. It appeared that he and Mr. France had been speaking of different Bills, and accordingly he desired now openly and publicly to withdraw the charge relating to one of these measures which he had made against that gentleman. As regarded the other it came before him as an unopposed Bill and of course he dealt with it as such. The clause which he introduced was the commonest of all clauses, and the restriction which it imposed was simply upon taking any other lands of the railway company than were required for the purpose of making the junction. The wording of that clause had not been stated with perfect accuracy in the pamphlet; but Mr. France would take the proper steps to remove any false impression which might have been created.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they have received any further intelligence relative to the Fenian outbreak and the state of Ireland? For my part, I must say that I think that nothing shows more clearly the uncivilized and anti-social nature of this movement than the fact, which we have reported upon very good authority, that the shore wires of the Atlantic telegraph have been cut.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble Earl has not given me any notice of his Question; but, in point of fact, we have not received any information of the Atlantic Cable having been cut, and I have no reason to believe that it has been done. As to the other part of the noble Earl's Question, the only other information we have received is that the body of insurgents, as they call themselves, variously stated at from 400 to 800 in number, began to retire the moment they heard that regular troops were in motion against them, that they have taken refuge in a wood, where preparations are being made for surrounding them, and that great hopes are entertained of the whole body being dispersed or captured.

EMPLOYMENT OF VOLUNTEERS IN CIVIL DISTURBANCES.

QUESTION.

LORD VIVIAN asked the Under Secretary for the Home Department to explain the reply given by the Home Office to the Mayor of Chester in answer to his request for information as to the capacity of Volunteers to act in their military capacity under the direction of the civil authorities. The reply given was that the Volunteers could not be called out in their military capacity to aid in the preservation of the public peace, but that in case of emergency the Volunteers might be called out as special constables, and, in case of emergency, would be justified in using their arms. That might be the law; but, if so, he ventured to think it a state of law very much to be deprecated, and he asked whether the Government had under their consideration any proposal to amend it so as to enable the Volunteers to act, like the yeomanry, in their military capacity if called upon? The civil authorities should know whether or not they had the power to call out the Volunteers to act with them. If the telegraphic wires had been cut, the civil authorities at Chester might have been placed in considerable difficulty before receiving instructions from the Home Office. Outrages might arise in many parts of the country, and therefore he thought the civil authorities ought to be informed as to the duties of the Volunteers. He hoped that if it should be necessary an Order in Council would be made or a short Act passed to enable the civil authorities to call out the Volunteers. He felt that the Volunteers were as amenable to discipline as most troops of the line, and if they were to use their arms at all, it should be under the command of their officers, and they should not be left to their own guidance to act in any way they might think proper in quelling a riot.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: The answer I have to give is this. The only occasion on which the Volunteer Corps can by law be called out for military service is in case of actual or apprehended invasion of any part of the coasts of the United Kingdom. Except in that case, therefore, they cannot be called out in their military character. But as civilians acting as special constables they may be called upon to aid the civil power in quelling disturbances, and in cases of emergency there would be no objection to their using their arms, as I suppose anybody else would be justified in using arms under similar circumstances. The Government at present has no intention of proposing a Bill for altering the law in this respect.

LORD VIVIAN inquired whether the Volunteers acting as special constables could move as an embodied force under their officers?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: It appears to me that the reply of the noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) has placed this question in an unsatisfactory position. In the Volunteer Act of 1863, as introduced by Lord Palmerston's Government, there was a clause founded upon the then existing law as contained in the original Volunteer and Yeomanry Act, by which power was given to lords-lieutenant to call out Volunteer Corps in aid of the civil power with the sanction of the Secretary of State. That clause was struck out in the House of Commons; and, as the law now stands, there is no power to employ Volunteer Corps for the suppression of civil disturbances. It is quite true, as stated by the noble Earl, that Volunteers, like any other of Her Majesty's subjects, may be sworn in as special constables, and may act in the same way as any other special constables; but to go beyond this and to issue to them their Government arms and ammunition would raise a new question, which would, as it seems to me, require serious consideration. I will not express a positive opinion upon the subject at this moment; but it is clearly one upon which no doubt ought to exist, and I trust that the Government will re-consider the matter, and will take steps to remove the doubts, in which it is now involved, in consequence of the novel view which appears to be taken of it by the Home Department.

EARL GREY: I wish to ask whether, in striking out the clause alluded to, it was not the intention of the other House to relieve the Volunteers from the obligation of serving except in case of invasion; and whether it is not lawful for the civil powers to call upon the Volunteers to quell an insurrection, although it is equally lawful for the Volunteers to decline to respond to the call, and indeed any call except in case of actual invasion by a foreign Power. I am persuaded that the moment there was any real danger apprehended from local disturbance the Volunteers would willingly respond to the call of the civil power; and I quite agree with the proposition of the noble Lord who introduced the subject, that if they come at all, with arms in their hands, they should come as an organized body, and with officers commanding them, and not as individuals. But this is, I think, a most objectionable mode of viewing the matter. It is highly desirable to know whether the lords-lieutenant of counties would be justified in calling on officers of Volunteers to bring out their corps, with the understanding that it is not obligatory on the men to attend.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY did not wish to lay down the law, but he would tell their Lordships what occurred in 1830, under circumstances similar to those of the present time. In 1830 there were very serious riots in the South of England, especially in his own neighbourhood, where farmhouses and ricks were burned, and where, indeed, there was a sort of rebellion. There were no troops whatever at hand, and special constables were sworn in to the number of many hundreds, and each was allowed to arm himself as he chose; some had guns, some swords, and some pistols. They were a most motley set, but they used their weapons effectually, and the riots were suppressed, and these proceedings were held to be legal.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he apprehended that there was nothing whatever in the circumstance of a man becoming a Volunteer to deprive him of any right that he had as a civilian, or to relieve him from any obligation he was under as such; and in cases in which the magistrates might call upon other civilians to preserve the Queen's peace they might also call upon Volunteers. And in every case in which civilians might use arms, Volunteers might also use them. He could hardly conceive that such a body of men as the Volunteers, if called out to suppress a riot, were not to avail themselves of their organization and act in the most efficient manner possible.

LORD LYTTELTON said, that the whole matter turned on the degree of emergency—for instance, the Volunteers would not be justified in assembling in arms to repress any common disturbance—while in extreme cases they would be justified in doing so.

LORD PORTMAN said, if the Volunteers were called out as civilians to assist in maintaining the peace, their arms would be in the depôts, and could not be taken from thence except by the order of the officer commanding. He thought that the notion that the Volunteers could go to take their arms otherwise than in accordance with the order of their officers would be likely to lead to very dangerous disturbances. On the other hand, if the officers were to order them to do so, they might be acting contrary to law. He thought, also, that the Volunteers ought to be kept only for the purpose for which they were embodied as Volunteers, and he would rather in an emergency of the same sort see the kind of force that had been referred to as acting in 1830, than that individual Volunteers should, at their instance, take their arms from the depôts. It ought not to be sanctioned that they might use the arms which had been furnished by the Government for any other purpose than to combat the enemies of the country. Nothing could be more dreadful in his opinion than to see one class set against another, as would be the case if Volunteers were called upon to suppress a revolt on the part of their every-day companions. With the military the case was different; they lived at a distance, and, in most cases, would be quite strangers in the town to which they were called.

THE EARL OF VERULAM recollected that when, in 1830, the civil force was marching upon a body of rioters they met the under sheriff, who gave them the authority of the High Sheriff for what they were doing; and he apprehended that it would be within the power of the High Sheriff to authorize any body of Volunteers to act as a posse comitatûs in case of emergency.

EARL COWPER said, he thought that the clause which the Commons had struck out was very wisely expunged. Many of their Lordships would remember that the use of the Yeomanry regiments in quelling riots in past times had made that force very unpopular in large towns. It might be very necessary that such a useful force as Volunteers should exist and lend their aid in quelling riots; but he should be very sorry if they obtained the same amount of unpopularity as the Yeomanry formerly did. This feeling was no doubt in some cases owing to petty jealousies existing between one class and another, but it was also owing to the recollection of the employment of the Yeomanry in former days. At this time the Volunteers were popular with all classes. He thought the Volunteers should not be called upon in their military capacity except for the purpose of preventing foreign invasion. There certainly might be circumstances in which the force might be required to act for the protection of the country, but he hoped they would not be employed to quell mere riots, nor to act as a body at all, but that they would act, if at all, as special constables simply.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE was of opinion that there was a great difference between the employment of the Yeomanry and the Volunteers; because, whenever the Yeomanry were called out, the men were paid for their services, and the Mutiny Act was read, while the Volunteers were, of course, subject to no such regulations.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, it is of the greatest possible importance to the interests of the country that this subject should be clearly understood. The military authorities have been, and are at this moment, placed in great difficulty, because they do not know exactly how they are situated. I cannot conceive any situation of greater complexity than that of the officer stationed the other day at Chester with his sixty men. He was not, of course, aware what was going to happen, and he did not know upon what assistance he could rely. The captain in command was not a local authority, and the Mayor was not able to decide how he should act. I should, therefore, like to know what the captain was to do in the emergency. Of course, as a military man, he would have been glad to have received all the assistance the Volunteers could have afforded him; but in doing so he might have committed an illegal act, have made himself amenable to the laws of his country, and might possibly have been tried for his life. I think, therefore, this question ought to be cleared from every shadow of ambiguity, and that the authorities should distinctly understand how they are to act with regard to the Volunteers should occasion require. I beg your Lordships to understand that I give no opinion upon the question of law; but it ought to be most clearly understood, and the clearest instructions ought to be given, not only to the lords-lieutenant of counties and the civil authorities, but also to those in command of the military, so that it may be clearly defined whether the Volunteers are in the position of mere special constables or are permitted to take arms in their hands. We have been told that they might use any arms which they might happen to possess; but even in that case the Government weapons would be chiefly employed, because great numbers of our Volunteers keep their arms at home. My noble Friend has referred to the circumstances of 1830, but it should be remembered that there were no Volunteers at that time. If the Volunteers are allowed to arm themselves, the result of course will be that they will make use of the best weapon in their possession, and will employ the public arms and ammunition; but it is doubtful whether or not they would be justified in using them. For my own part, I have very great doubts about it. At all events, it is a question which ought not to be left in this ambiguous position, and I therefore hope to see some regulations laid down in which the question will be dealt with, and the position of the Volunteers and the power of the civil and military authorities most clearly defined.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I am inclined to agree with the illustrious Duke, that there ought to be a clear understanding upon the subject, and I will take care that that shall be the case as far as the Government can deal with it. I may, perhaps, also say that I had not the slightest doubt about the matter. If a magistrate had come to me to ask me to arm the Volunteers under my command with the Government arms I should, undoubtedly, have refused to do so. The Act is as clear as anything can possibly be upon the point, and I always believed the Volunteers understood what their duties were under such circumstances. By becoming Volunteers they do not abdicate their rights or duties as citizens, and are liable to be sworn in as special constables, and when so sworn in would naturally be armed as special constables usually are armed. And I do not believe that there is any confusion upon the subject in the country. I never heard any Volunteer officer express a doubt upon it, and I, as a Volunteer officer, should refuse to give up the Government arms at the request of a magistrate.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: I may point out that the question has arisen because the Mayor of Chester, the civil authority on the spot, did not know what to do, and telegraphed for instructions.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that at all events it was necessary that all ambiguity should be removed, for it was clear that at present no proper understanding existed on the subject.

EARL BEAUCHAMP hoped that in case such a state of things as had taken place at Chester recurred some power would be reserved to the civil authorities to use the arms lodged in the Volunteer dépôt. Such a thing ought not, of course, to be done, except in great emergency; but when that emergency did occur there ought to be some power to turn to account the available resources of the country.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to order. There was no Question before their Lordships.

LORD DUNSANY observed, that 1,500 strangers had been assembled at Chester, presumably to commit high treason, but not a single arrest had been made. He did not blame the authorities for this, but he thought the circumstance suggested that there was some danger of extreme leniency in dealing with political crimes; indeed, in Ireland political crime had almost ceased to be regarded as crime. The leniency shown to political offenders had made it appear that high treason was about the safest thing in the world to indulge in; in fact, it required more courage to rob a henroost than to break into one of the Royal castles.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE COLONIES.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in moving an Address for certain Papers relating to the Church of England and Ireland in the Colonies, said, he might, perhaps, be permitted to state in a few words why he moved for these Papers at that period of the Session. Their Lordships would remember that when the subject was last brought forward there was a general impression of the want of information which existed as to the actual condition of our colonial Churches; and it was the general opinion that either by a Select Committee of their Lordships' House, or some other way, more accurate information ought to be obtained about our colonial Churches, and the feelings of the colonists upon their connection with the Church at home, before any legislation should be attempted. He did not intend to say that Her Majesty's Secretary of State had departed from the understanding then arrived at, but undoubtedly matters did not remain in statu quo, and considerable change had taken place; so that they ought as soon as possible to obtain such information as was necessary to the proper consideration of the subject. Their Lordships were aware that the colony of Natal was in a very curious state, and that in matters ecclesiastical nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the condition of the Church in that colony. Their Lordships were aware that the Bishop to whom he was referring had not only entirely lost the confidence of the great majority of the clergy of the diocese over which he had been sent to preside, but also that of the great majority of the clergy of the Church of England at home; and, in his opinion, there had been good reason for the withdrawal of that confidence, since the system of theology propounded by the Bishop of Natal was not such as should be held by the chief pastor of one of our colonial Churches. In fact, he might venture to quote the words addressed by a noble Duke to the Bishop of Natal, "My Lord, you have told us at very great length what you do not believe; it is high time you should tell us what you do believe." A great deal of excitement prevailed in reference to this matter in the colonial Church, and, in fact, generally throughout the colony. He saw from a manuscript journal kept by a young clergyman residing in that diocese that anything more painful than the party spirit existing in the colony with reference to this question could scarcely be conceived. He was bound to say that the party antagonistic to the Bishop did not appear to have shown any great wisdom in their actions, and he was sorry to find that the good cause had suffered from very bad handling. Under the circumstances to which he alluded, the Colonial Chaplain had thought himself justified in calling together a large assembly of the clergy of the diocese—excluding, of course, those who did not agree with his opinions—for the purpose of electing a successor to the Bishop of Natal, who still continued to hold Her Majesty's letters patent. It was needless to observe that a good deal of confusion had occurred on that occasion. Fourteen out of the eighteen clergy of the diocese having assembled, seven voted in favour of the appointment of a new Bishop—not exactly a new Bishop for the See of Natal, but a Bishop who should practically take the place of the Bishop of Natal—and seven against such a proceeding; whereupon the Colonial Chaplain gave a casting vote in favour of proceeding to an election. He merely stated these matters to show the existence of a very complicated state of things, which had changed greatly since the close of the last Session. How the difficulties which existed were to be got over he would not pretend to say. His right rev. Brother the Bishop of Oxford had wisely told those who were about to proceed with their election that they had better take no steps in the matter until all the legal questions had been settled. Unfortunately, at the very moment when the election was about to take place the despatch of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) arrived, and was construed as giving some sanction to the proceedings. He had read the newspaper accounts of that despatch, and, if they were correct, that document did not appear to him to justify in any degree the construction that had been placed upon it; since it was based upon the sound principle that the Secretary of State would not interfere in any way in so delicate a matter. It was not for him to say whether it might not have been wiser on the part of the Secretary of State not to have answered the communications which had been addressed to him on the subject; but the letter appeared to have been based upon a right principle in saying that there were courts of law which could decide whether this gentleman was entitled to his salary; and if those courts did not put the question at rest there was their local Legislature, which could say whether the money voted for the salary of the Bishop had been misappropriated. He was therefore sure that the despatch had been misconstrued when it was said to have authorized the colonial clergy in proceeding to the election of a new Bishop. With regard to the second paper for which he moved—namely, the despatch of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Lord Bishop of Montreal, relating to the appointment of a coadjutor Bishop of Niagara, dated the 21st of November, 1866, he was ignorant of the grounds which had influenced the noble Earl in writing that despatch. According to the custom of the Church of England ever since the Reformation, no Bishop, either at home or in the colonies, can be consecrated without Her Majesty's licence or mandate, and there was a passage in the Prayer Book enforcing that regulation; the regulations of the Prayer Book were declared by the two Acts of Uniformity to be a part of the law of the land; and, therefore, before those regulations could be dispensed with, the colonial Legislature should state whether they intended to set aside the Act of Uniformity as regarded the Church of England in Canada. His impression was that the Canadian Legislature had bound themselves to follow the regulations of the Prayer Book, and that they had incorporated the Act of Uniformity in their laws. However that might be, he ventured to entertain an opinion that, whether legal or not, it was very undesirable in this particular instance to permit the Bishop to have been consecrated without Her Majesty's licence. He was aware that there were two cases in which Bishops had been consecrated without Her Majesty's licence. The first was that of Bishop Mackenzie, who laid down his life in the wilds of Southern Africa, and whose memory was mourned and regarded as sacred by a large portion of the Church of England; and the second was that of Bishop Patterson, who was entitled to the highest respect for his self-denying efforts in the conversion of uncivilized races of the South Seas. With the exception of these two cases there was no instance of a Bishop having been consecrated to a home, colonial, or missionary district without the Royal licence or mandate. Bishop Tozer was consecrated under what was called the Jerusalem Consecration Act. The Church of England in Canada had acquired great independence in consequence of the Acts of the local Legislature sanctioned by the Imperial Parliament, and by the approval of Her Majesty; still, up to the present time, no Bishop had ever been consecrated in Canada without the Royal licence. He had no doubt the Colonial Secretary had sufficient reasons for the course he had adopted; but he (the Bishop of London) thought it desirable it should be known what these reasons were, for he thought these were not times when it was desirable either for the clergy or laity that the Royal supremacy should be disregarded. He was aware that it would be said that once the Canadian Church had obtained the power of electing its own Bishops the granting a licence would be little more than a form; yet he ventured to hope that in a form of this kind some principle was involved, especially when it was the only remaining tie between the two Churches. It was most desirable to maintain the connection between the Colonial and Home Church. There was another point to which reference had been made. He quite agreed it was most important that a tribute should be paid to the supremacy of the law. People should not be encouraged to suppose that the law of a Christian country, sanctioned by the State, should be lightly set aside by those who pleaded what they were pleased to call "a higher law"—the higher law of the Church. The law passed by the Legislature of a Christian country, should have a binding force on the Church itself. There was another matter to which he must refer. He observed that the despatch was written on the 21st of November, and on the 5th of that month a most important judgment had been delivered in the Rolls' Court, where it was laid down that it was a mistake to suppose that confusion had been introduced by the decision of the Privy Council. In point of fact, according to that decision, as he understood it, a Bishop of the colonial Church, appointed under Her Majesty's letters patent, was very much the same as a Bishop at home. Her Majesty assigned him a district within which he should exercise his functions, and even where there was an independent Legislature the Bishop might exercise power over the Church, with only this difference, that he could only exercise coercive jurisdiction through the agency of the civil courts, which would consider the laws of the Church of England as part of the compact under which the clergyman and the Bishop had respectively acquired their several positions. Now, the words of the statute, according to the authority of the Law Officers of the Crown, seemed to be in exact contradiction of that decision. The decision of the Master of the Rolls had not been disputed; no appeal had been taken, and it might be supposed by some that such was the law of the land. It was somewhat curious, however, that the despatch made no reference to that judgment, which had been given a short time before it was written. He wished to say a few words on the subject of another paper for which he had moved. He was afraid the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) would hardly be able to produce all the papers, because, as he had been informed, the Returns were yet imperfect; but if those which were in the Office were produced, they would form a very satisfactory contribution towards the solution of this great question. During the recess he had written a great many letters to the colonial Bishops and others connected with the colonies, that he might obtain information for himself and his right rev. Brethren with respect to the present complicated state of affairs in the colonial Church. He had received answers to his letters from upwards of twenty dioceses; and he could state that there was by no means that unanimity on the part of the colonial churches, which had been represented last Session, as to the desirableness of separating from the Church of the mother country. In fact, it would be found that the majority was against that principle. It was by no means the feeling of those most interested in the welfare of the colonial Church. They understood what the Church at home was, and they had no desire to separate themselves from the system under which they and their fathers had lived. He believed nothing was held so sacred by the colonial Churches as their connection with the Church at home. Even the Metropolitan Churches had no general desire to separate from the home Church. The Metropolitan Churches were Canada, India, New Zealand, South Africa, and Australia. With regard to Canada, its position was so peculiar that it was to be expected that almost absolute independence would be claimed by the Church in that colony. In New Zealand it was said there had been a movement on the part of the Bishops to declare the Church altogether independent;

but they had yet to learn that this step of the Bishops had been sanctioned by the Church of New Zealand. One of the Bishops, in a letter to him, had characterized the step as a most mischievous one. With regard to India, the last letter he had received from that eminent, large-hearted, and wise man, whose loss the whole Church was now mourning—he meant the late Metropolitan of India, Dr. Cotton—stated that he trusted, whatever was done elsewhere, no such principle would be introduced into the Church of India. The Bishop of Ceylon also wrote to him saying that it was entirely a mistake to suppose that the Church of India wished to be separated from the Church at home. With respect to Australia, which from many circumstances was supposed to be hostile to the connection with the Established Church of England and Ireland, it was his impression from letters he had received that there existed in that dependency the strongest feeling for the maintenance of that connection. He had letters sent from the diocese of Adelaide and from the diocese of Melbourne, and he would read certain resolutions adopted at a Church meeting in Melbourne. They were in these terms—

“That in the opinion of the assembly any Imperial legislation calculated to loosen the connection between the United Church of England and Ireland and the body of Christians in Victoria professing to belong to that Church would be highly injurious. That in the opinion of this assembly the principal points to be kept in view towards maintaining such connection are,—1. The preservation of the Church in this colony as an integral portion of the United Church of England and Ireland, although not connected with the State as an Established Church. 2. The appointment of Bishops to the United Church of England and Ireland in Victoria, according to a uniform rule, so as to avoid the danger of several individuals claiming simultaneously to be Bishops of the same diocese. 3. An appeal in all ecclesiastical causes to the supreme ecclesiastical tribunal of the United Church of England and Ireland.”

He thought, then, that he had a right to say that it was requisite to have this great question clearly settled. It would be satisfactory if before the close of the Session some of the high legal authorities in their Lordships' House would state what was the real and actual condition of the Church of England in their several colonies. The right rev. Prelate concluded by moving an Address for—

Despatch of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Officer administering the Government of Natal on the subject of the

Colonial Chaplaincy in that Colony, dated 12th August, 1866: Also,

Despatch of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Lord Bishop of Montreal relating to the appointment of a Coadjutor Bishop of Niagara, dated 21st November, 1866: And also,

Copies of any Returns which have been made in answer to Questions lately issued by Her Majesty's Secretary of State in reference to the Condition and Circumstances of the United Church of England and Ireland in the Colonies.—(The Bishop of London.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had no objection to produce the Papers for which the right rev. Prelate had moved. The Returns were not in a complete state; but he should be happy to lay on the table such of them as were in the possession of the Colonial Office. In reference, however, to what had fallen from the right rev. Prelate, he was not prepared to admit that there was an understanding last Session that this matter should be submitted to the consideration of a Committee. A question was indeed asked with respect to a Bill brought in by his right hon. Predecessor in the Colonial Office, and he then stated that he would not proceed with that Bill, but that during the recess he would consider the propriety of legislation on the subject, and would be prepared in the present Session to state what course he would pursue. He now took this opportunity of giving notice that he would very shortly lay before the House a measure which would deal with the principal difficulties which, in his opinion, were to be contended with in reference to the condition of the Church in the colonies; and it would then be for the House to determine whether that measure was sufficient for the purpose, or whether it would be desirable to appoint a Committee or take any other step. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) stated that in the course of the autumn he had issued circular letters to the colonial Bishops and to some other persons. He had no doubt that the drawing up of those communications was very carefully considered, not only by the right rev. Prelate, but by other Members of the right rev. Bench. But after the statement just made, he should be glad to see the letters, and to know the colonies to which they were addressed;—for, as their Lordships were aware, there was a material difference in respect to this matter between Crown colonies and other colonies; and to know to what other persons they were sent besides the colonial Bishops. The right rev. Prelate had moved for a copy of the despatch addressed to the Lieutenant Governor of Natal respecting transactions which arose in that colony, and had also asked whether the despatch to which that was an answer could be produced. If he remembered rightly, the last-mentioned despatch was addressed to his predecessor in office, and he was not prepared to say off-hand how far it was possible to produce it; but he should be very happy to lay it on the table if he found that there was no objection to its production. He would state the circumstances under which his own despatch was written. In consequence of certain writings, believed to be of an heretical tendency, Bishop Gray, in his supposed capacity of Metropolitan, pronounced a decree of deposition upon Dr. Colenso in his supposed capacity of suffragan Bishop. The question came by reference before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and by the judgment of that tribunal the deposition was declared to be invalid. Failing therefore in this, Bishop Gray had recourse to the spiritual and only remaining weapon at his command, and pronounced a sentence of excommunication upon Dr. Colenso. Mr. Green, dean of the cathedral and Colonial Chaplain, to whose office a salary of £100 was attached by vote of the local Legislature, in obedience to the orders of Bishop Gray, published the sentence of excommunication, and refused to hold intercourse with Dr. Colenso as his spiritual superior. On this Dr. Colenso applied to the civil authorities to mulct Mr. Green of his salary, and to enforce obedience to him by deprivation. That application he (the Earl of Carnarvon) declined to endorse. It was, fortunately, not his duty to interfere in this most unhappy dissension, and he was not prepared to set in motion the secular arm at Dr. Colenso's request, and to curtail the clergy of Natal of any liberty which the recent judgment of the Privy Council had conferred upon them, either in acknowledging or in not acknowledging Dr. Colenso as their spiritual superior. But he could not leave this part of the question without bearing his testimony to the unhappy and most mischievous position of affairs at the Cape on this question. That position was greatly aggravated by the perplexity that now beset the legal bearings of the case. There were no less than three most important judgments pronounced by three eminent Members of their Lordships' House, all upon ecclesiastical questions, and all at the Cape of Good Hope. In Long's Case Lord Kingsdown laid down the law that the Church of England, in the colony in which the case arose, stood in precisely the same position as the Church of any other denomination of Christians—neither in a better nor a worse; and that differences between the Bishop and the clergy must be decided by reference to the civil courts upon the principle of a contract, expressed or implied, and exactly as the case of a Wesleyan or Roman Catholic body would be decided by a reference to the terms of the trust-deed. That judgment was perfectly clear and intelligible. Again, there was, two years ago, a second judgment pronounced by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, with the principles laid down in which their Lordships were familiar. Those principles were that, in a colony which happened to be possessed of an independent Legislature antecedent to the issue of letters patent, it was not competent for the Crown to create a bishopric with a territorial sphere of action, and that, even assuming it to be competent to it to create such a bishopric, it was impossible for it to convey to the Bishop any coercive authority or jurisdiction. That judgment, also, was perfectly clear and intelligible. But within the last few months a judgment had been pronounced by the noble and learned Lord the Master of the Rolls which he did not think he mis-interpreted when he spoke of it as laying down the doctrine that it was competent for the Crown to create a bishopric in such a colony; and that, although it might not be possible for it to confer coercive power on the Bishop, yet that he would have recourse to the civil courts of the colony for the purpose of enforcing obedience to his orders. In fact, that judgment went to lay down the principle broadly and distinctly that the Bishops of the Established Church of England and Ireland, and the Bishops of the Anglican Church, as it was called in the colonies, differed from one another in no other respect than that the former had the Ecclesiastical Courts to fall back upon, and the other the colonial courts. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) would not have the presumption to set up his own opinion on the subject; but it was, he contended, in the opinion of ninety-nine laymen out of every hundred—he should hardly be far wrong if he added, in the opinion of ninety-nine out of every hundred lawyers also—impossible to reconcile that judgment with the others to which he had just referred. Indeed, it appeared to him that there was a conflict between them as great as the English language was capable of expressing. It would, under those circumstances, he thought, be very desirable that we should have some light thrown upon the subject, and see whether these judgments were actually at variance, for the matter involved the highest interests of both the clergy and the laity. Having said thus much with respect to the question of Natal, he should next touch upon the last point which the right rev. Prelate had brought under the notice of the House—the letter to the Bishop of Montreal relative to the appointment of a coadjutor Bishop of Niagara, for which he had moved. On that point the right rev. Prelate had taken him rather severely to task, and he felt it therefore necessary to explain to the House the circumstances under which that letter was written. The Bishop of Toronto being, as he believed, of great age and infirm in health, had become unequal to the discharge of the duties of his diocese. He had accordingly been informed by the Bishop of Montreal that a coadjutor Bishop had been elected by the Diocesan Synod of Toronto, and it was proposed to him that he should advise the Crown to issue the usual mandate for his appointment. He (the Earl of Carnarvon), however, declined to issue that mandate, and the right rev. Prelate complained that in doing so he had been guilty of a great error. Now, he had been induced to act as he had done in the matter, after giving the matter very great consideration, first of all, because the position of the Canadian Church was a peculiar one, amounting, in fact, to one of virtual independence. It had been the gradual growth of years. In 1851 an Act was passed which, after reciting in the preamble that the recognition of equality among all religious denominations was a principle of colonial legislation, proceeded to make several enactments taking away from the Crown certain powers. In 1854 another Act was passed, in the third clause of which it was distinctly laid down that it was desirable to remove in the colony all connection between Church and State. That Act of 1854, he might add, was no other than that which provided for the secularization of the clergy reserves in Canada. In consequence of that Act Mr. Labouchere, then Secretary of State, pointed out in a despatch to Sir Edmund Head, Governor

General of Canada, the fairness and expediency of removing all restrictions upon the Church now that all advantages had been taken away. Accordingly, two years after another Act was passed giving the Church in that colony the most complete and ample powers of self-government. It was the charter of the Canadian Church: it enabled the Church to adopt regulations for the enforcement of discipline, and for the appointment, deposition, deprivation, or removal of any person holding office therein. The Act was somewhat new at the time of its passing, and some doubts existed as to its validity, and the unusual course was adopted of sending it by reference to the Privy Council. Before that tribunal the case was argued by two eminent lawyers—the present Attorney General and Sir Roundell Palmer, and the result was that the validity of the Act was confirmed and that it received the sanction of Her Majesty.

LORD TAUNTON: Was not the reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Yes, and ever since the passing of the Act Bishops had been elected with complete freedom, and the fullest measure of Church government in Church matters has not only been accorded to but actually enjoyed by the Church in Canada. Letters patent and the mandate still continued, however, as part of the procedure; but successive Law Officers, having regard to the facts which he had just mentioned, had raised objection to the issue of letters patent as being no longer necessary—delay and inconvenience were found to attend their issue; and accordingly, in 1863, they were abandoned by the late Duke of Newcastle, and nothing but the mandate remained. Looking, then, to the complete independence of the Church of Canada, and the circumstances which he had stated, he (the Earl of Carnarvon) had declined to advise the Crown to issue the mandate in the case to which the right rev. Prelate had called their Lordships' attention. There were other considerations, also, which he thought justified him in taking that course. He had to take into account the recent judgment pronounced by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and to bear in mind that that judgment declared that in colonies possessing an independent Legislature—as Canada did—it was beyond the competence of the Crown to create any bishopric with a territorial sphere of action. He could, under those circumstances, only come to one conclusion, and that was, that it was not the part of the Crown to interfere in the creation of a new Bishop or bishopric in the present instance; and that it was not consistent with the dignity of the Crown that he should advise Her Majesty to issue a mandate which was not worth the paper on which it was written, and which, if sent out to Canada, might be disregarded. The right rev. Prelate appeared to attach great weight to the issue of those mandates; but he (the Earl of Carnarvon) did not think it was really of so much importance as he seemed to imagine. The mandate was obligatory under the rubric, and the rubric was binding under the Act of Uniformity. That Act was, no doubt, very binding in this country; but when the right rev. Prelate said that it was of full force in the colonies, he stated that which he (the Earl of Carnarvon) believed no constitutional lawyer would endorse. The mandate for the consecration of a Bishop here was a very different document from that which was applicable there. The mandate for the consecration of a Bishop in this country was regulated by the Statute of Henry VIII. That Act laid down a long series of proceedings. It provided for the Royal Licence, the letters missive, and lastly, the mandate. But when a Bishop was consecrated in the colonies, there being no dean and chapter, there could be no congé d'élire, there were no letters missive; and hence portions were struck out of the mandate, and the mandate itself would go out altogether a different document. And, therefore, if the right rev. Prelate relied on that Act as making it necessary to issue a mandate, the Act proved a great deal too much, for it also made necessary the Royal Licence and letters dimissory. Throughout the whole of this matter, which he well knew deserved careful attention, he had acted under the guidance of the Law Officers of the Crown; and so anxious had he been to obtain their full concurrence that when the recent judgment was given by the noble and learned Lord the Master of the Rolls, he referred the case back again to the Law Officers, before writing to the Bishop of Montreal, in order that there might be no danger of mistake in the matter. The opinion of the Law Officers only referred to the case of the Canadian Church, but he had no reason to doubt that it was equally applicable to other Churches similarly circumstanced; and, without pledging himself to adopt any particular line of action, he entertained little doubt that in a similar case he should act upon precisely similar principles. There was this distinction to be observed: if it were desired that the consecration of a colonial Bishop should take place in England, then he freely admitted that the Royal mandate must be issued to the Archbishop, in order to untie the hands of the Archbishop and to enable him to perform the office; but if the consecration was to be in the colonies, as in this Canadian case, then he should not advise the Crown to issue the mandate. He would have been glad to pause here; but he was bound to say two or three words upon another point raised in the course of the debate. The right rev. Prelate who had moved for these documents had found great fault with him on account of some supposed desire on his part to separate the colonial Church from the Church as by law established in this country. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) begged to assure the right rev. Prelate that he was actuated by no such desire; he simply accepted things as he found them; and in all civil and temporal matters he did practically find that the colonial Church was entirely separated from the Established Church in this country. As to spiritual matters, that was a wholly different question. There never, probably, was a time when on the part of the colonial Church there existed a stronger desire to maintain the same standard of faith and unity of doctrine with the Established Church in this country. But as to identity in temporal matters, that had entirely vanished, and it was idle to talk of it. Not a single Church of the colonies was at this moment an Established Church. Canada, Victoria, New South Wales, Adelaide, South Australia, one after another had repudiated the idea of anything like an Established Church; and matters had gone so far that in South Australia, if he remembered rightly, the Legislature had absolutely refused, on one occasion, to pass an Act merely referring to the Church of England because it might seem to give a legal existence to it. Therefore, the colonial Church at this moment was entirely in the position of a voluntary association, as Lord Kingsdown had described it; it was precisely in the same position as the Wesleyan body, the Roman Catholics, or the Baptists—neither better nor worse than they were. The right rev. Prelate had spoken of the Royal supremacy. That was a delicate matter to touch upon, and a layman approaching its consideration could only speak of it with the greatest diffidence. It might not be very easy even in England to define all the powers of the Royal supremacy, which were circumscribed and limited by various Acts of Parliament. But he had no hesitation in saying that in those colonies which were possessed of independent Legislatures the real powers of the Royal supremacy had not been exercised, and it might fairly be presumed did not exist. He believed that noble and learned Lords generally would be disposed to agree in this—that the Royal prerogative consisted, speaking broadly, of three great powers; the power of convening ecclesiastical convocations, synods, or assemblies—whichever they might be called—the disposal of ecclesiastical causes in Ecclesiastical Courts, and lastly, the appointment of Bishops. The power of convening ecclesiastical convocations and synods he believed had never once been exercised in any single colony; the decision of ecclesiastical causes in Ecclesiastical Courts had been pronounced by lawyers over and over again to be wholly beyond the competence of the Crown in those colonies; the appointment of Bishops was the only power exercised, and that rather by way of patronage than as any part of the supremacy. But by the recent judgment of the Privy Council even the power as to the appointment of Bishops was curtailed and reduced to the merest shadow of right. Therefore, as far as the Royal supremacy went, it was really a misuse of the term to speak of it as applied to any of the colonies. It was not desirable that Parliament should mix itself up with questions of this kind, or to appear to side either with a party in this country or the colonies. The only principle for which he had contended was this—that Parliament must be exceedingly jealous of doing anything which could in any way interfere with that principle of colonial independence which had been so constantly laid down and so solemnly and deliberately sanctioned. Persons might talk of wishing not to separate the colonial Church from the Established Church of England; but if those words meant anything they really meant an attempt to build up again, on the wreck of Churches thrown down by the colonies themselves, a superstructure of endowment and privilege. Anybody who knew anything of colonial feeling, and the tenour of colonial society, must know that such a design it would be utterly impossible to carry out. If the point sought to be accomplished were for the benefit of the Church of England, it would be held, and not without reason, to be unfair to other denominations to place the Church of England in a position of superiority to any other religious body in the colonies. If, on the other hand, it would not be for the benefit of the Church of England, then it would be unjust to impose on her growth and free action restrictions which were no longer balanced by correlative advantages. So much for the temporal connection between the two Churches. As regarded their spiritual affinity, not a single line could be brought forward to show that the warmth of feeling of the colonial Church for the Church of England had in any way abated. On the contrary, he believed that the spiritual ties uniting the colonial to the Established Church in this country were stronger now than they had almost ever been, and that in spite of the unhappy dissensions of which so much was frequently made. He was disposed to believe that the ardour of their attachment for the religion of the mother Church had increased, and would continue to increase, just as the loyalty and affection of the colonists for the mother country itself had kept pace with the generosity and freedom of the gifts made to them in matters of purely temporal government.

LORD CRANWORTH said, there was no such necessary inconsistency between the judgments of his noble and learned Friend Lord Romilly, and that delivered by Lord Westbury on behalf of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as was supposed by the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies. The Bishop of Natal claimed, by virtue of his letters patent and his consecration as Bishop, pursuant to the Queen's mandate, to be entitled to the enjoyment of a certain trust fund in this country, which had been created for the endowment of a Bishop of that colony, and the judgment of his noble and learned Friend the Master of the Rolls—whether right or wrong he did not say—was that there was nothing in the judgment of the Privy Council to disentitle him. There was a passage in the judgment delivered by his noble and learned Friend the Master of the Rolls that had been misinterpreted. That passage was as follows:—

"On this subject an expression has been made use of in the judgment given in the latter case before the Privy Council, which is, I think, liable to be misunderstood, and which it is essential to notice. It is there stated to this effect:—The Lord Chancellor who delivered the judgment, having observed that after a colony has received legislative institutions the Crown stands in the same relation to that colony as it does to the United Kingdom, proceeds thus:—'It may be true that the Crown, as legal head of the Church, has a right to command the consecration of a Bishop, but it has no power to assign him any diocese or give him any sphere of action within the United Kingdom.'"

Taken by itself, it might appear as if his noble and learned Friend had expressed some opinion with regard to the validity of the Bishop's appointment or jurisdiction; whereas it would be seen by the whole tenor of the judgment that the only question for his decision, and the only question which was, in fact, decided by him, was whether the Bishop of Natal, in the equivocal position in which he then stood, was entitled by virtue of the Queen's letters patent to the income of certain trust funds. Whether his noble and learned Friend was right in the judgment or not he would not venture to say, particularly as he might be called on, as a Member of their Lordships' House, to give his opinion hereafter on the case. But he thought it only fair to his noble and learned Friend that an erroneous construction should not be put upon the terms of that judgment.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that the question which had been brought before the Master of the Rolls was not one of doctrine; but the point for his decision as an Equity Judge was merely whether the Bishop of Natal did or did not continue to be the c'estuiqui trust of certain funds, and the noble and learned Lord had decided the point in the affirmative; but he had nothing to do with the question of doctrine. It was competent to those persons who might be dissatisfied with his judgment to appeal either to the Lords Justices or to the House of Lords direct, who would then be enabled to pronounce a clear decision on the case.

LORD TAUNTON said, he had listened with great satisfaction to the just, the true, and the statesmanlike principles which had been laid down by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and he should have much more confidence in the decisions of a responsible Minister, acting under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and with that respect for colonial liberties which the noble Earl had manifested, than in any conclusions to which a Committee of the House could come to. When they talked about the Church of the colonies they should remember that they referred to communities of very different characters. They sometimes talked of India as a colony. But India was no colony; it was a great Empire, and the position of a Church of England Bishop in it was very different from one in an ordinary colony. He could understand the Church deriving some benefit from its connection with the State in India; but when they came to the case of our great populous colonies, those who cared for the true interests of the Church of England would scrupulously avoid putting it in any position where it might seem to be at variance with the general community amongst which it was placed. When it fell to his Lord Taunton's lot, as Secretary of State, to deal with the Church of England in Canada, the proposal to sever it from the Church of England was accepted by the unanimous vote of every member of the Church of England in the Canadian Legislature, and with the full concurrence of the Bishops. It was also recommended by the able Governor of the colony Sir Edmund Head, who said it was a great concession on the part of the colonial Parliament that it should have consented to mention the Church of England in a statute at all, so jealous—so absurdly jealous perhaps—was it of putting the Church of England in a different position from that of any other religious body. He (Lord Taunton) was sincerely attached to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England; and not less as a member of that Church than as a Minister of the Crown had he laboured to promote the passing of that Act. But then it was said that it was an object of great importance to keep up the supremacy of the Crown. In the mother country he believed he was as jealous of maintaining unimpaired the Royal supremacy as any man. He looked upon it as the shield of the laity, and as being absolutely necessary, not for the restraint merely, but for the support of the Church of England, and that to remove it would be dangerous to the Church as an institution. But the case as regarded the colonies was totally different. Nothing could be more unjust or unfair to the Church of England in the colonies than at once to divest her of the advantages which she might have derived from her connection with the State, and to strip her of the revenues which at one time she had enjoyed in nearly all the colonies, and then to fetter her with the restrictions which belonged to her former condition. There was no one in their Lordships' House from whom he differed with greater concern than the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London); but he had imported into the consideration of the question too much of principles and sentiments, most valuable as applied to the Church at home, but having no application whatever to the state of things existing in the colonies. He (Lord Taunton) could not but rejoice at any voluntary consultation that might take place between the scattered branches of the Anglican communion and the Church of this country, but in order to this everything in the shape of authority on the part of the Church here must be put aside. As for the danger of the latter departing from her doctrines, they had a remarkable instance to the contrary in the Episcopal Church of the United States. The members of that Church owed us no obedience, yet their views and opinions were sound, and they were amenable to discipline among themselves. He was rejoiced to know that the members of that Church were increasing in number, and that they formed the most respectable part of the community to which they belonged. It was through such channels as these that the Church of England was able to spread her doctrines to all parts of the world, and he was happy in knowing that this was not the least of the blessings which the Anglo-Saxon race conferred upon mankind. He hoped that the measure of the Government when introduced would go far towards clearing away the difficulties which now beset the question.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he had given private notice to the noble Earl of his intention to move for abstracts of letters patent and other documents relating to the present legal position of the Church of England—a Motion he might not have made if he had not known that the materials already existed. It might be in the remembrance of their Lordships that in the course of the discussion of last Session on the petition of a certain benevolent lady (Miss Burdett Coutts) who had largely contributed to the foundation of colonial bishoprics, he took occasion to move that the petition, together with the whole of the subject of the colonial Church, should be referred to a Select Committee. No objections to such a course was offered at the time, and the change of Government which shortly afterwards ensued alone prevented this Motion being pressed. He had since been asked by lay Peers on both sides of the House to repeat his Motion for a Committee, which was not to stand in the way of legislation, nor to usurp the functions of that House, but to procure more information for their guidance. His opinion had not been the least altered upon two points—namely, that there was at the present moment a great injustice, and that there was a great want of information. That there was a great injustice no one could deny that had paid the least attention to the legal decision which had lately taken place. Two Bishops at least had been plunged into litigation and difficulties, from which they could not see any prospect of immediate deliverance. These two Bishops had gone out to the colonies upon the faith of letters patent under the Great Seal of England that they had had certain dioceses allotted to them; and it was certain that they had given up benefices in England where they might have lived in peace. But it was not merely a question of civil, it was really a question of most important spiritual right; and at the present moment the colonial Churches were waiting with the utmost anxiety for the determination of the question whether they should or should not have guaranteed to them union with the Church of England, the use of the same Articles, and the same form of worship—whether, in short, colonists going forth from this country should or should not bear with them the same spiritual privileges as those which they had enjoyed at home? There was also injustice to persons like the benevolent lady whose case had been brought before the House last year, in delaying the settlement of the question. There was also a wrong to the Crown itself, whose dignity must be compromised by its being left in the position of inflicting a great wrong upon many of its subjects. But was there difficulty as well as wrong? No one could doubt that. The noble Lord had given an interpretation of the two judgments he had quoted, which he (the most rev. Prelate) should be delighted to think was correct; but, speaking as an ignorant layman, he could not reconcile them. There are three judgments to be harmonised—that given in Long's Case, that in Bishop Colenso against the Bishop of Cape Town, and that in Bishop Colenso against the Colonial Bishoprics Council. In Long's Case, and in the second Case of Dr. Colenso—in the first judgment and the third — there was a substantial agreement — namely, that the Church of England in the colonies stood on the same footing as any other religious body, but when he came to the third decision the case seemed to be quite different. Thus, by the first and second it appeared that the Queen could not create a diocese; but the third seemed to say that it was possible for Her Majesty to give ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the colonies. The two first judgments said that a colonial Bishop could have no coercive jurisdiction; but the third stated that he had power over his clergy to the extent of depriving them by his inherent powers and the rules existing in his community. He (the Archbishop of York) did not say that his views were right, but they were at least not singular; for an eminent lawyer had written a pamphlet, in which he showed that the three decisions could not be brought into harmony. Again, in the Case of "Campbell v. Shaw," which was the judgment on which all the subsequent ones had turned, it was laid down that when a colony had obtained "representative" institutions the power of the Crown passed away; but the more recent decision had altered the phrase in "legislative" institutions, and this would include a Crown Council, such as actually existed in the diocese of Natal, under the Queen's patent, at the time that Bishop Colenso's patent was issued. Thus it had come to be held that the existence of a Crown Council, resting on no stronger foundation than a Royal patent, invalidated a subsequent Royal patent; and that the first having invalidated the second was then re-called, and the whole thing vanished like a dream. He did think it very desirable that, before proceeding to legislate, they should obtain better information, and that the proposed Bill, before it passed, should go before a Select Committee, in order that the opinions of all classes, and especially of the colonists themselves, might be taken upon the subject.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, there was one reason in particular why he wished to address a few words to their Lordships on that occasion—namely, that it would have been a matter of regret to him if the debate had come to a conclusion without any Member of the Episcopal Bench endorsing those sentiments of liberality towards the colonies and of earnest desire for the freedom of religion among those communities which had been that evening expressed by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies and from a noble Lord who had formerly occupied the same post (Lord Taunton). He had listened to the speeches of those two noble Lords with intense satisfaction, for they manifested a perfect disentanglement from those cobwebs that usually beset the minds of those who approached this question, and evidently bespoke a strong sympathy with the colonies, and a determination to look difficulties in the face, and to acknowledge the actual state of things, instead of endeavouring to talk that state of things away. The speech of the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies was an admirable comment upon the whole case; and his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Cranworth) had spoken of the general agreement between the two judgments which had been delivered in the courts. To those judgments, of course, they must bow; but what he complained of was the obiter dicta which ran through them, and which were not entitled to the same shield of invulnerability as the judgments of the Courts were. It should be remembered that the Church of England in the colonies was a purely voluntary body, like the Wesleyans or any other body of religionists—having an internal regulation of its own, but having no connection with the Crown except as being subjects of the Sovereign. It was a misapprehension to suppose that the Church in the colonies had the same power of appeal to the Privy Council as the Church at home. The Queen's supremacy was an essential part of an Established Church; but what was the meaning of an Established Church? That it was a corporate body possessing property? No; it meant that instead of being merely a voluntary and tolerated society, it was a legal corporation with internal powers which were recognised by the Queen's Courts. It had been decided that the Queen could not create the smallest spiritual court in the colonies. To ask the colonists to look for a remedy in the supremacy of the Crown was to offer to them an illusion. The Metropolitan in New Zealand finding that he had no power under his letters patent, the Synod came to a unanimous agreement to adopt the formularies and professions of faith of the Church of England, and bound themselves never to make any alterations unless there were previous alterations made at home. The connection between the colonial Church and the Church at home was not to be maintained by illusory documents or high-sounding claims. It was to be maintained by allowing the Church in the colonies to develop for itself the true Church of England temper, doctrine, profession of faith, and internal government; thus giving it the help they could give it to stand up among free men there, itself there, a free Church, among free religionists a free religion. They must not put them off from what would be an abiding reality and teach them to trust to what, when they came to try it, would prove a broken reed.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he wished by all means to maintain the connection between the colonial Churches and the Church at home; and the greatest security for this was to maintain for both the same ultimate court of appeal. No doubt there were difficulties, but they should struggle with them manfully rather than "cut the painter," and throw the small Churches loose to all the chances of their own organization and without reference to the great metropolitan authority at home. There was no place where the Church of England was so popular, or where there was so distinct a recognition of all her organization, as in Melbourne. The colonists there had petitioned the House of Commons and Her Majesty that they might not lose this bond of connection, to which they attached the very highest importance. It would be a most unstatesmanlike and unkind way of treating them to refuse the boon they asked and leave them unprotected, unassisted, and unguided. Possibly, it might be better to leave some of the larger colonies alone; but they should hear what each had to say, and adapt their remedy to the particular case. He hoped the Bill would be submitted to the consideration of a Committee.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in reply, said, he was quite ready to place in the hands of the noble Earl the correspondence he had with the Bishops, Archdeacons, Deacons, and Registrars in the colonies, which might be made public if it was considered advisable. He had heard it stated with the greatest satisfaction that the step taken in not issuing a licence for the Canadian Bishop was not to form a precedent. At all events, Canada was entirely an exceptional case. He thought they did require further information before proceeding to legislate. The matter was so complicated that every colony must be dealt with according to its peculiar characteristics, and he hoped that when the Bill was brought forward they would not be all treated in the same manner.

Motion agreed to.

RECOVERY OF CERTAIN DEBTS (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to facilitate the Recovery of certain Debts in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1^o. (No. 14.)

QUESTION.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) will state to the House, What information he has received from Ireland since yesterday respecting the events which are passing in that country?

MR. WALPOLE: The information which I have received since yesterday is this. The armed bodies whom I mentioned yesterday as marching upon Killybegs doubled back when they were within fourteen miles of that town, and then went to Toomies Wood. Brigadier General Hersford had so large a force that he was not merely able to follow them, but, I believe, he also expected to be able to surround the wood; and therefore it may be considered that this movement at any rate is now pretty nearly, if not quite, put a stop to. No other intelligence has reached the Home Office of an authentic kind, excepting that the information which comes from the Irish Government adds emphatically that it may be considered that the present movement in the south-western part of Ireland is completely arrested.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the telegraphic wires have been cut in different places, as is stated in the public papers?

MR. WALPOLE: I have seen it stated in the public papers that such is the case, but I have myself received no information to that effect, and therefore I cannot say one way or the other.

COLONEL FRENCH: Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether there is any foundation for the statement that the Fenians were as numerous as 800?

MR. WALPOLE: No telegram that I have received has mentioned the number, and I am unwilling to state anything from mere conjecture.

METEOROLOGICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Storm Signals, as hitherto practised by the late Admiral Fitzroy, are to be continued; and, if so, in what manner, and by whom; if to be discontinued, whether it would not be prudent previously to invite the Chambers of Commerce of the Kingdom to express their opinion on the subject; and, whether the valuable and instructive Meteorological Report which had appeared daily in The Times and some other papers will be continued; and whether observations from the Paris, Brussels, and St. Petersburg Observatories could not be added to it?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I will explain the position in which this question stands. After the late Admiral Fitzroy's death, an inquiry took place into the whole system of the Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade, as of course it was necessary to make some provision for supplying his place. A committee was appointed, consisting of a representative of the Royal Society, a representative of the Hydrographical Department of the Admiralty, and a representative of the Board of Trade. That committee reported fully on the whole subject, and their report was to the effect that the observations which were originally intended to be made, in order that they might form a foundation for a scientific system of meteorology, had been of late years to a great extent discontinued, and that more attention had been given to storm signals and weather forecasts than to the perfection of those observations. The committee recommended that for the future more attention should be paid to the collection of information than heretofore, and, consequently a larger Vote will be proposed, the greater part of which will be spent on observations such as were originally contemplated. They also proposed that the management of the work should be transferred to a scientific committee appointed by the Royal Society, and such a committee had been appointed, and would have placed at its disposal all the information at present possessed by the Board of Trade. As soon as the matter had been placed in the hands of the Royal Society they informed the Government that they were not prepared to continue the storm signals, as they rested upon a mere hypothetical basis, and of course, if they were not prepared to prophesy, the Board of Trade could not be expected to do so. Information would be collected and reported by telegraph to stations throughout the kingdom, and such information would be given in time to enable any place where there was a disposition to make use of signals, the opportunity of forecasting the weather for themselves. Since the hon. and gallant Gentleman gave notice of his Question, I have received from General Sabine, the chairman of the committee appointed by the Royal Society, a note with reference to this subject. He says—

“The usefulness of the present stations from which telegraphic communications are daily received is under consideration, but the final selection of the stations is in the hands of the committee, who are of opinion that no advantage would be gained by receiving communications from Paris, Brussels, and St. Petersburg. These stations are not on the sea-coast, and telegrams from the last-mentioned station would not be received in time for publication in the daily papers. This is the case with Skudesnes, Helder, and Corunna. The committee already receive six telegrams from the coasts of the Continent; and none have been discontinued since the department has been in their hands. They are not prepared at present to recommend any additional expense to be incurred on this head.”

Great advantage would no doubt be derived from having the communications referred to.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

MR. READ asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education,

Whether the Government intend to compensate the owners of cattle suffering from cattle plague which were slaughtered by the order of the Government Inspectors previous to the passing of the Cattle Diseases Act of February, 1866; and, if so, at what rate compensation will be granted, and over what period it will extend?

MR. CORRY: Arrangements have been made for granting compensation for diseased animals slaughtered under the authority of the Orders in Council between the 26th of August, 1865, and the 23rd of the following November, at which date the slaughtering powers were revoked on the recommendation of the Cattle Plague Commissioners. From the 23rd of November to the passing of the Act at the beginning of last Session the inspectors had no power to order the slaughter of diseased animals, and consequently the Government are not disposed to grant compensation for that period. The rate at which the compensation will be made from August to November, 1865, will be the same as that fixed by the Act of last Session—that is to say, one-half the value of the animal, less any amount received from insurance, local rates, or the sale of the hide or carcass.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Will Returns be made giving detailed information respecting the cattle plague?

MR. CORRY: Returns giving detailed information respecting claims for compensation for losses by the cattle plague were called for; but when they were examined in the office they were not considered to be satisfactory Returns, and they were accordingly sent back to the local authorities for revision. I have not heard, however, whether the revised Returns have been yet received. I do not imagine that there would be any objection to lay them upon the table.

MR. J. B. SMITH: Out of what funds is it intended to pay this compensation?

MR. HUNT: A supplementary Estimate, delivered this morning, of £25,000 will be taken to meet this compensation.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he will take care that ample notice shall be given before that Estimate is submitted to the consideration of the House?

MR. CORRY: Certainly.

MR. READ: Am I to gather from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks that in no case will compensation be given for carcasses or hides buried by Order of the Council?

Mr. Read

MR. CORRY: No compensation will be given for animals slaughtered between the 23rd of November and the passing of the Act of last Session. The compensation to be given after the passing of that Act is fixed by the Act itself.

COMMISSION ON RAILWAYS.

QUESTION.

MR. PIM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he expects that the Report of the Commission on Railways will be laid before the House?

MR. WALPOLE said, that the Report of the Commission on Railways was very nearly completed, and therefore in a short time it would be laid before the House.

VACCINATION.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUCE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether it is his intention to re-introduce the Vaccination Bill, as amended by the Select Committee last Session?

MR. CORRY said, it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Vaccination Bill this Session; but it might possibly not be identical in all its provisions with the measure of last year.

SMALL TENEMENTS RATING ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL asked the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been called to the effect of the Small Tenements Rating Act in disqualifying the occupiers of tenements, the rates of which are paid by the landlords, from voting in the election of Guardians of the Poor and other officers, and to its bearing in connection with the enactments giving plurality of votes to those who occupy premises rated at the higher amount; and, whether it is his intention to propose any alteration in the law?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that since the hon. Member had given notice of his Question he had made inquiries upon the subject, and, upon consideration, it was not his intention to propose any alteration of the law. As he understood by the operation of the Small Tenements Rating Act, occupiers rated at only three quarters of their rent, the rate being paid by the landlord, were not themselves qualified to vote, but the owners, under certain conditions, voted as if they were occupiers.

What he understood the hon. Member to mean by the last part of his Question was, that where these owners were in occupation of houses of their own at the same place, they voted in respect of them, and so got a plurality of votes through their ownership of small tenements. That did not seem to him to be an unfair principle, and therefore he could not propose an alteration of the law.

CORRUPTION AT ELECTIONS—THE REFORM RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR BULLER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, upon Monday, February 25, he will give any explanation of the measures which the Government are prepared to propose for the more effectual prevention of Corruption at Elections?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: With reference to the Question just asked me by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and the two other Questions I find on the Paper, I would say that on Monday, the 25th instant, before I move that we shall consider the Reform Resolutions which I then intend to bring forward, I will make a statement to the House which will meet the points (measures to prevent corruption, whether plurality of votes would be adopted, and whether the reduced value of the qualifying tenement in counties and boroughs would then be moved).

NAVAL YARDS.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to carry out the Recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1861 relative to the system of control and management of the Naval Yards, and to the purchase of materials, or any part of the Recommendations on pages vi. and vii. of the Report; whether the Controller of the Navy is the officer to whom the First Lord of the Admiralty looks for the efficiency and economy with which the Dockyards are managed; and, if so, whether it is, in his opinion, conducive to the efficiency or economy of such Establishments that an officer in the position of Storekeeper General (who is entirely independent of the Controller), should be entrusted with the duty of keeping up the necessary supply of material for the Dockyards; whether it is true that the office of Storekeeper General is to be abolished, and his clerks, or some of them, to be transferred to the Controller's Office, so as to form a Store and Supply Branch in the Controller's Office; whether, if such abolition is to take place, the recently created Contract Office (now, as appears by the Navy Estimates, a separate department), is to be made the sole purchasing Department; whether any office is to be created for taking stock of stores and materials, and for accounting for them to Parliament; and, whether all the heads of Departments are to be made responsible directly to the Naval Minister, and, through him, to Parliament?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in answer to the first part of the Question, said, that in the course of the last six years the late Board of Admiralty carried out some of the recommendations, and others they had not adopted, but he hoped his noble Friend would not deem him wanting in respect if he did not reply fully to this voluminous Question, which would necessitate a long statement, more especially as the whole subject was to be brought forward in a short time by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely).

INSURRECTION IN CRETE—SERVIA.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

MR. GREGORY rose to move an Amendment for an Address for Copies of Correspondence with foreign Governments on the subject of the Insurrection in Crete, and the Servian fortresses, and for Reports of our Consular agents on those subjects. He said, that in 1863 he brought under the notice of the House one of the most inexcusable outrages that had taken place during the last quarter of a century—namely, the bombardment of Belgrade by the Turkish garrison. He used the word inexcusable advisedly, resting that expression on the protests of all the Consuls, headed by Mr. Longworth, and on the Reports of the Consuls of France, Italy, and Prussia. Between the Mussulmans and the Christians in Servia there had always existed a bad feeling; but this outrage had aggravated that feeling into such intense hatred, that no one could tell what the next day might bring forth. Any rash word or action might end in the destruction of a Turkish garrison or of a Christian town. With discontent so rife as it was, it was impossible that people could pursue the avocations of peace, for capital and commerce deserted a country which might at any moment become the theatre of sanguinary insurrection. In 1863 he showed that the imports of Belgrade, which in the second half of 1861 were valued at 31,500,000 of Turkish piastres, in the second half of 1862 (after the bombardment of Belgrade) had fallen to 16,000,000 piastres. Since then, the Servians had prayed and besought the European Powers to aid them in obtaining removal of the Turkish garrisons. They had shown that all internal improvement was at a standstill, and must be as long as the two peoples were in presence of each other, and they had pointed out that Moldavia and Wallachia, without a Turkish garrison or even a single Turk, acquiesced willingly in the suzerainty of the Porte. If, however, these fortresses were intended to repel foreign aggression, how much more necessary would it be to maintain them on the frontiers of Moldavia, the most accessible point from which Turkey could be attacked by the only enemy likely to assail her in that direction. Surely, if they could be left ungarrisoned still more might Serbia, which was exposed to attack only from Austria, the last Power to be suspected of aggressive designs. These fortresses were originally nothing more than old Turkish outposts, whence the Turks issued to lay waste Christian territory. Now they could serve only to irritate and terrify the Servians, and to impose on Turkey financial burdens which she could not bear. The result was, Serbia had become the focus of intrigues, whence discontent in Montenegro, the Herzegovina, and Bosnia received encouragement. It was perfectly notorious that the fabrication of arms and munitions of war was carried on, and that the Servians were determined to appeal to the sword rather than submit to the continuance of a state of things so intolerable. Could any one doubt but that the first shot on the Danube would be re-echoed in Montenegro, the Herzegovina, Thessaly, Epirus, and though not perhaps immediately, yet ultimately in Bulgaria? Could any one help fearing that the shock between the Crescent and the Cross might not spread ever onward, and its undulations be felt in massacres and tumults wherever

Mr. Gregory

Christianity was brought into contact with Islamism? His object was to prevent this catastrophe. He had no wish to see the Turkish Empire torn to pieces without anything to replace it. His policy was gradually to bring these Christian dependencies of the Porte to civilization and self-government; to render them fit to stand ultimately alone; and to become worthy heritors of what must eventually be theirs. That was the true solution of this dreaded Eastern question—a solution identified with the happiness of many millions of people, the stability of their future institutions, and the peace of Europe. There were three policies pursued by the three greatest Powers in dealing with the East of Europe. There was the Russian policy, which was one of pure self-interest and aggrandizement. Its object was to keep the Eastern Christians united to it by the bonds of a common faith in constant discontent and turbulence. It had no desire to see them rise, thrive, and become strong, self-governing, and satisfied. Mis-government and misery were the foundations of its strength. Remove that mis-government, and her arms fell idly to the ground. It was extraordinary the unblushing cynicism with which this course of conduct was avowed. The instant other nations endeavoured to effect a permanent settlement of any portion of these countries there stepped in Russia, affecting an astonishing punctiliousness for the rights and independence of the Porte. Read the papers lately presented about the Danubian provinces, and it would there be seen that when England and France approved their choice of a foreign Prince Russia opposed that choice with might and main, on the ground of its interference with the authority of the Sultan. Did the House of Commons imagine that these people were blinded to all this? Quite the reverse. The Servians understood it—the Greeks understood it better. They remembered the Czar's conversation with Sir Hamilton Seymour, in which he said that Russia would never tolerate Greece becoming a strong and united kingdom. Nevertheless, so great is the irritation and despair, that these people, finding the Western Powers indifferent, if not hostile, turn their eyes and hearts to Russia, because from her they obtain a sympathy if even interested, and promises if even false. As to the next, the English policy, he was bound to say that it was, at all events, disinterested though inconsistent and mistaken. We had pursued the policy of preserving at all hazards the integrity of Turkey, whatever the sufferings or the wishes of her Christian dependencies. He did not for a moment mean to imply that England was indifferent to the oppression, the misgovernment, and the sufferings which had been inflicted upon those Christian populations. We had interfered, protested, menaced, beseeched. The whole course of Sir Stratford Canning's diplomacy at Constantinople, as also Lord Palmerston's action at the Foreign Office, had been a continued protest. But what he meant was this, that the sufferings and discontent of the Christian dependencies of Turkey seemed to be as dust in the balance when compared with the fancied danger of the removal of one single pebble from that crumbling edifice. We had gone on year after year, hoping against hope that we could work a cure where the disease was inveterate, that we could wash a blackamoor white, or render any system of Turkish government enlightened, progressive, and humane. Surely, to persevere in such a system was wrong, after years of experience had proved it to be a failure; a failure as regards the happiness of millions of Eastern Christians; a failure in its main object—namely, placing a barrier in the way of Russia. It was also inconsistent. For we had invariably hailed the independence of every people that had escaped from oppression to self-government. We had given moral assistance to the Republics of South America; we gave more than moral assistance to Greece. We had rejoiced at the independence of Italy, and the expulsion of the Austrians. But if the bad government which these countries had suffered was as nothing compared with the oppression of the Christian dependencies of Turkey, was not our conduct inconsistent? If any one wished to have an exposition of the true policy which we ought to pursue, let him read the speech of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) on the subject of the Danubian principalities. Of the many wise and noble speeches which the right hon. Gentleman had made, history would pronounce that speech to be one of the wisest and the noblest. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"I must really say that if it were our desire to embroil the East, to sow the seeds and create the elements of permanent difficulty and disunion, to aggravate every danger which threatens Turkey, to pave the way for Russia, and to prepare willing auxiliaries for Russia in her projects southwards, we could not attain those objects by any scheme better laid down than that of abandoning our pledges and promises and giving in to Austrian policy."—[3 Hansard, cl. 65.]

But Austrian policy was synonymous with English policy, as was proved from the speeches of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald. On that occasion, Mr. Gladstone proceeded—

"It is natural that Austria should view with the utmost jealousy anything that tends to give freedom, vitality, and strength to her neighbours on the Danube. It is impossible to blame her on that account; but it is probable—it is natural—it is reasonable and right that we at least should beware of being drawn into her policy."—[3 Hansard, cl. 50.]

In another place, he said—

"It is a great object of European policy to prevent the extension of the Russian power in the direction of Constantinople. . . . The best resistance to be offered to Russia is by the strength and freedom of those countries that will have to resist her. You want to place a living barrier between her and Turkey—there is no barrier then like the breasts of free men."—[3 Hansard, cl. 59.]

This was his justification for saying that our policy was unwise; and he felt additionally justified if the rumour were true that Austria had at length seen the error of her ways, and that Baron Beust had discovered that to deprive these provinces of all that contributes to vitality, strength, and contentment was to place the most powerful weapons for her own chastisement in the hands of that powerful neighbour, Russia, who looked on her with no loving eye. He (Mr. Gregory) had described the policy of Russia and England; there remained the policy of France. Doubts had been expressed as to her sincerity. Whatever it might have been, at present he thought it was enlightened and sincere. It might have been different, and no doubt it was in former times when there was a perpetual rivalry throughout the world. It was then sufficient for England to recommend and for France to oppose. French diplomacy was the unscrupulous opponent of Marcocordato, the best statesman of Greece, and the advocate of Coletti the worst. Much of the evil doings of King Otho, the curse and ruin of Greece, were performed under French influence and support. But that was the policy of the past. He would borrow his definition of French policy in these days from the words of that distinguished statesman M. Guizot. He said—

"To maintain the Ottoman Empire for the purposes of European equilibrium, and when by the natural progress of events some dismemberment takes place, some province detaches itself from the crumbling Empire, to favour the transformation of that province into a new and independent sovereignty, which would take its place in the family of States, and serve one day to form a new European equilibrium—that is the policy which suits France, it is one to which she has been naturally led, and in it, I think, she will be wise to persevere."

He was perfectly confident that before long that would be the policy of England also. He could see public opinion tending steadily that way. Ever since the outrage in 1862, to which he had adverted, took place, France had advocated the removal of those fortresses, which were only a source of weakness to Turkey, while they were a menace and an insult to Serbia. What did M. Thouvenel say upon this subject—

"While the right of garrisoning these fortresses incontestably belongs to the Porte, I do not hesitate to believe that the Porte would do wisely in acceding to the demands of Serbia. Turkey, in evacuating these provinces, would find herself placed in the same position it occupied towards Moldo-Wallachia in Egypt. The discontent of the Servians can alone induce them to favour those troubles which may arise in the Turkish provinces. On the contrary, if their wishes were satisfied, they would have less inclination than ever to second those of neighbouring populations. I see no better hope or means for the Porte to take away from these agitations the only chance they have of creating danger, than by deferring to the demands of Serbia."

Judging from the papers that had been produced, he had reason to believe that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Stanley) would proceed in a wise and liberal course. Whatever might have been the policy of England twenty-five years ago, the noble Lord would probably acknowledge that it was not applicable to the present state of affairs, and he felt justified in hoping that the course which England might pursue would be followed by other nations. The noble Lord, in the Correspondence on the Danubian Principalities, wrote thus in July, 1866—

"The strength and not the weakness of the Principalities was the best source of security to the Porte."

If the noble Lord would substitute Serbia for the Principalities, and deal with Serbia in that spirit, he would be perfectly satisfied. Up to this point, and in recommending that Serbia should be placed upon precisely the same footing as Moldo-Wallachia, he had spoken without the slightest hesitation; but in approaching the circumstances of the Cretan insurrection, he confessed he did so with faltering and hesitation. He was thoroughly aware of the character of the Greek people, of their enthusiasm, their excitability, their readiness to hail every incident and word as pregnant with encouragement. Such being the case, and knowing the additional misery which the protraction of the war would entail upon Crete, he dreaded lest any unguarded words might excite illusory hopes of assistance, and be the means of protracting a hopeless struggle, if the struggle be hopeless. For the last six months pillage, murder, and devastation had been laying waste one of the finest islands in the Mediterranean. At the very threshold was an instance of the difficulties attending this discussion. What was the origin of these troubles? Who were really the guilty parties? The Turks maintain that the outbreak was not owing to mis-government, but was excited by foreign emissaries, with a view to annexing the island to Greece. M. Moustier, the French Minister, in his note, inserted in The Moniteur of December 5, held nearly the same tone as Ali Pasha, adding that the sound part of the population had not hitherto participated in the insurrection. Baron Brunnow, in a conversation with Lord Stanley, seemed to have arrived at a similar opinion. There was, on the other hand, positive evidence that the iniquitous mis-government of the Turks was the sole cause of the outbreak. The circumstances attending the insurrection of 1866 resembled exactly what occurred in 1858. In 1858 the Cretans assembled in order to demand a redress of proved and intolerable grievances, and dispersed on receiving assurances that this would be done. At that time Turkey had its hands full with Montenegro and the Herzegovina, and as usual, at first temporized, and on being pressed, promised. Not one pledge was fulfilled. Instead of those promises having been performed, the taxes had been increased, and the administration of justice was more flagrantly iniquitous and corrupt than it was before. A passage in the petition which the Cretans had addressed to Her Majesty was one of the most pathetic that he had ever read. It was as follows:—

"We pay enormous taxes, which are increased each year, without enjoying any of the advantages which all nations receive in return for such taxation. Justice is a thing unheard of. We have no tribunals worthy of that name; nor have we any laws. Our government depends on the arbitrary will of the representative of the Sublime Porte. Our children, from want of public instruction, wallow in ignorance; the few schools we have are maintained at our own small means. The clergy are even paid by us. We are not admitted into the public service. We have no roads or bridges. Our evidence is of no avail against that of a Mussulman. The excesses committed by the Turks are rarely punished. We have never experienced any of the advantages enjoyed by the poorest subjects of civilized nations. We are the slaves of another race."

After expressing their utter distrust from better experience in the promises of the Porte, they represented their desire for annexation to Greece; and, in default of this, implored that something at least might be done to obtain for them a political organization under which there might be laws and regular tribunals, less grievous and better imposed taxes, by which the morality of the people might become possible, and that at least one part of the revenues of the country should be expended in its improvement. This petition assuredly did not convey the impression that they were determined all along upon insurrection, even though their grievances were redressed; and the British Consul, Mr. Dickson, stated, that when they met in May to petition the Sultan they were unarmed, and unanimously professed their sentiments of loyalty and submission to the Porte. Moreover, a statement recently received by the hon. Member for Reading from the American Consul disclosed a degree of misgovernment quite sufficient to account for the outbreak. Have we any moral doubts that it can be otherwise with Crete than with other portions of the Ottoman Empire? The Consular Reports of 1860, on the condition of the Christian defences of the Porte, showed that in every part of its dominions justice was unknown, and the lives and properties of the Christian populations without any protection. The Cretans, in the first instance, assembled to ask for a redress of their grievances, and they then dispersed, leaving thirty of their number to await the answer of the Turkish Government. The Porte not only resorted to evasion and delay, but before giving a reply sent 6,000 Egyptian troops to occupy every point of strategical importance, while the Governor occupied himself in endeavouring to arrest every man who had taken a prominent part in the movement. Under these circumstances the Cretans flew to arms, and then the Porte, acting on its usual policy, sent Mustapha Pasha as a Commissioner with promises of redress. Before, however, he arrived the mischief had been done, and peace had become impossible. Mr. Dickson, who had behaved throughout with great prudence and propriety, said—

"Up to the arrival of Mustapha Pasha many excesses have been committed in those districts, whole villages having been sacked and laid waste, churches and mosques having been violated, and even some graves have not been spared in the work of wanton destruction that has been going on. The conduct of the military is described as having been bad in several instances."

Then came a series of testimonials from unbiased persons of the atrocities committed by the Turks. Mr. Erskine, writing on November 3, said—

"I have seen letters from three different persons in Candia, all foreigners, who speak of the conduct of the Turkish and Egyptian troops as simply atrocious. One gentleman describes the massacre of 200 persons, chiefly old men, women, and children; and the barbarities committed by the troops as beyond all belief. Another states that the Turks refused all quarter to the Christians, and mercilessly chopped off the heads of the unfortunate wounded, as well as dead, a reward of 100 lira having been offered for each head thus brought to the camp. The writer of this letter adds, it is true, that similar barbarities are committed by the Christians. If these statements at all resemble the truth, it may be conceived how difficult it will be ever to reconcile the Christians to the Turkish rule, or to persuade them to live harmoniously with native Mussulmans whom they accuse of such horrors."

At a later date Mr. Erskine quoted the opinion of one of our own naval officers, Commander Pym, to the following effect:—

"He is no less confident that the Cretans will not submit to the Turkish yoke one moment longer than is absolutely necessary, and that as soon as any considerable portion of the Ottoman forces is withdrawn the people will rise and again seek to avenge the numerous wrongs which have been inflicted upon them by a barbarous Government and a savage and brutal soldiery."

Despatches from Commander Pym and Mr. Erskine described the outrages committed by the Turks upon the Christian population of Crete, especially upon women. The account given by the Russian commander was to the same effect. He added, that the Turks hoisted English colours in order to decoy these unfortunate Christians, non-combatants, old men, women, and children within range, when they opened on them with grapeshot. The last telegrams stated that this insurrection had ceased; but it appeared to him quite impossible that the Cretans would ever return to Turkish rule. The horrors and outrages they had endured at the hands of the Turks would never be forgotten; they had left wounds which could never be healed. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) might be perfectly certain that there never would be peace in Eastern Europe so long as these insurrections were perpetually bursting out. He gave the noble Lord the fullest credit for humanity. His conduct had been most kind and conciliatory, and his action contrasted favourably with that of the stern, harsh, and menacing course of the French Government. He was glad, however, to perceive from these papers that some change was coming over the policy of the French Government. It seems that some proposal had been made to give a local autonomy to the island; for the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had, on the 19th of January last, written a despatch to Sir Andrew Buchanan, in which he stated—

“We are willing to support the proposition of France and Russia for giving local autonomy to Crete. But we respect the independence of the Porte, and shall consider that in offering this friendly advice we have discharged our duty. We disclaim all idea of putting a pressure on the Porte. It is understood that the Porte has itself a plan for giving to the Christian population of the island guarantees for good government in the shape of some new administrative arrangement. We are glad to hear this; and provided that object be secured, we are indifferent as to the precise means. We do not understand by the word local autonomy anything in the nature of a separation of Crete from the rest of the Empire. Baron Brunnow expressed his satisfaction at this announcement, adding that he quite understood that it was not in accordance with the ideas or feelings of the British Government to carry intervention further.”

In another part of the blue book would be found a criticism on this proposal on the part of Prince Gortschakoff, and there was great good sense in the observations of the Russian Minister to Sir Andrew Buchanan, who, writing on the 30th of January to the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), said—

“His Excellency replied that he had received a memorandum communicated by your Lordship to Baron Brunnow as to the nature of the support which will be afforded by Her Majesty's Government to the proposals of France and Russia for giving local autonomy to Crete, but he feared that advice given to the Porte in the manner intended by your Lordship would be thrown away; and as I said that Her Majesty's Government had been assured that the plan which the Turkish Government were themselves preparing for establishing a new system of administration in the island would satisfy the legitimate wants of the inhabitants, he answered that he had no confidence in plans emanating solely from the Porte, and that there was little doubt that the reforms contemplated by the Turkish Government would prove as visionary as those promised by the Hatti-Humayoun.”

Mr. Gregory

The Cretans were evidently of the opinion of Prince Gortschakoff. By the latest accounts they had refused to accept the concessions offered by the Porte, knowing that they were not worth the paper on which they were written. He, for one, was not prepared to advocate at the present moment the union of Crete with Greece. That union must come sooner or later; but at present the great Powers were averse to it. They grounded their opposition on the pressure that must be put on Turkey, and the results that might follow from the pressure; and last, but not least, on the mis-government which prevails in Greece. What he proposed was that there should be an immediate, strict, and searching inquiry into the complaints of the Cretans. We had a right to know whether the promises made by the Porte in the Hatti-Humayoun of 1856 had been fulfilled, and whether the stipulations made by the Porte in 1858 with the Christians of Crete had been carried out. England, in 1856, had taken on herself obligations, and was bound by them to call upon the Turks to give an account of their stewardship. If these allegations of the Cretans were proved against the Porte, the Cretans had a right to claim the privileges of self-government. In 1830 Crete almost obtained her independence. The whole of the island, with the exception of three or four fortresses, was in the possession of the Cretans. Diplomacy, however, stepped in, and handed over the island, first to Egypt and afterwards to Turkey. One of the objections urged at the time against detaching Crete from Turkey was that the Mahomedan population at that time comprised one-half of the island. That objection did not now apply, because the Mahomedans had dwindled down to one-third of the inhabitants of the island, and, deducting the public functionaries and the army, the proportion was still lower. If the demand were made to annex the island to Greece, they would but follow the example of Lord Holland, Sir James Mackintosh, Lords Russell and Palmerston in recommending such a course. On the 16th of February, 1830, Lord Russell proposed a Resolution in reference to Greece, of which the following words were a portion:—

“That it is the confident hope of this House that such final settlement may be found to secure Greece a territory sufficient for national defence.”
—[2 Hansard, xxii. 549.]

It was because this hope was not fulfilled that Greece lost Prince Leopold, who foresaw the impossibility of governing the new kingdom with its restricted territory, and who was well aware that, with the Greek populations of Epirus and Thessaly left in Turkish hands upon her frontiers, there would be constant incentives to aggression and disturbance. Sir James Mackintosh deprecated, in the same debate, "the restriction of the Greek boundary." Then came Lord Palmerston, who, in words that seemed prescient of all that had since occurred, said—

"The Secretary of State had altogether failed in showing that the addition of Candia to the territory of Greece was not essential to the well-being and independence of the new State. . . . No man who had turned his attention to the subject could doubt that the political existence and the military defence of Greece would mainly depend upon the possession of Candia. . . . The Turks had wrongfully preserved possession of Candia, and now it was contended they should be allowed to profit by that wrong. It was a principle of law that no man should profit by his own wrong. It was a maxim of justice that the infliction of one injury should not stand good as a reason for the infliction of further and deeper injuries. It was acknowledged that, at the present moment, a civil war was going on in Candia. Were they to have another Treaty of London for the pacification of Candia? or was that devoted and unhappy island to be left exposed to the pouring forth of the vials of Turkish wrath in all its inhuman and atrocious barbarity, to a repetition of the atrocities of Ipsara and Scio? There had been a talk of amnesty; they must all, by this time, know pretty well what amnesty meant when translated into the languages of Spain, or Portugal, or Turkey. In Turkey they had a proverb that there were three merciless things—time, fire, and the Sultan; and if he knew anything of the history of Turkey, he would say there was little probability of that being less true at the present than at any former period. Let Candia remain in the hands of the Turks, and what probability was there that the Greeks in that island would remain patient under that yoke which their brethren had shaken off? . . . Would it be possible for the Sovereign of Greece to stand by and see thousands of his subjects slaughtered by the Turks without interference? . . . Or if both England and the Sovereign of Greece refused to interfere, the Greeks themselves would fly to the succour of their brethren, and then of what advantage would it be that the State was nominally at peace?"—[2 Hansard, xxii. 563.]

The latter part of this question was exactly applicable to the present state of things. Lord Holland used similar language. Most heartily should he rejoice if the rumour were true, that France was changing her attitude on this question. If this were true, he trusted England would advance with her. A faltering and timid policy would only aggravate the evil, and render the danger of an explosion throughout the East more imminent. He was aware it might be against the policy of the great Powers at present that Candia, or that Thessaly and Epirus, should be joined to Greece; but he felt sure that there were many Gentlemen then listening to him who would live to see those changes, though how or when they would be brought about he did not know. Who could have known a few years ago how or when Venetia would be joined to Italy? And yet that event had happily taken place; and so it will be, and that ere long, with Thessaly, Epirus, and Crete. It might be said by some that, whatever be the wishes of Crete, Greece was incapable of self-government, and unworthy of any extension of her territory. It was said that she was a failure, and had falsified every hope. But he must deny that assertion. Evil without end had been spoken of the Greek Government, and much evil also of the Greeks themselves. They were not Greeks but Byzantines, said the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard)—they were not descendants of that great people who once filled the world with the renown of their exploits—they were a mongrel bastard race, descended from the population of the Lower Empire, with all the turbulence, the corruption, and the other attributes of that people. Would those who indulged in these declamations against the Greeks remember what the Greeks had been and what they are? For 1,000 years they lay in a state of utter prostration. For 400 years afterwards they lay at the feet of the most brutal and ignorant race of conquerors that ever weighed upon the earth. They felt that their property, their lives, and the honour of their families, were at the mercy of shifting, arbitrary rulers, intent only on plunder and oppression. Their religion was insulted and reviled—their laws trampled under foot—justice had fled the land, but violence remained. That with such a past of almost moral death, that with such a present of misery and despair, there should still linger a spark of vitality and national character is a marvel in itself; but that all at once, at the last hour, they should with one great effort have rolled back the heavy stone from the door of their sepulchre, and in the noble words of Colonel Mure—

"That they should shake off the spirit of tame submission which had become to them a second nature; that they should rise to a man against the overwhelming power of their oppressors, and with all the native energy of a young and vigorous race of fierce barbarians, is an event unexampled in the history of mankind."

But was the war they waged during the long and dreadful struggle, between 1821 and 1830, a war of soft and silken Byzantines, or could it be worthily compared with the war of freedom of the noblest days of Greece? Was that fierce army of Turks, flushed with the arrogance of conquest and dominion, less formidable than that of Persia? Let him quote from Colonel Mure a comparison between the past and the present champions of the independence of Greece. Colonel Mure said, as eloquently as truthfully—

"The Greeks at the period of the Persian war were a people in the flower of youth and vigour, flushed with recollections of ancient glory, filled with the loftiest spirit of national pride and independence. The whole population was trained to arms, and inured to the dangers and duties of military life. Their lower classes were practical warriors, their upper ranks skilful commanders; their armies and fleets were in a high state of discipline and equipment, and were opposed to comparatively undisciplined and unwarlike hordes. In the case of the modern Greeks all these favourable circumstances were reversed. Their wealthier classes were either merchants or servants of the Porte—a timid and time-serving race—their warriors were brigands and outlaws, or raw unpractised peasantry; their mariners, fishermen or pirates. Their enemies were not only a race of approved valour and powerful resources, comparatively disciplined, experienced, and well equipped, but were cantoned in the heart of the country, and in possession of all its principal fortresses. But besides this, during the two or three first years of the war, they had not only the force of their declared enemy to contend with, but the still more galling hostility of his European allies, many of whom, under the name of neutrality, used every means consistent with the shadow of its maintenance to favour the Turks and browbeat the Greeks. Driven from their fields and homes to make their abode for months and years 'in deserts and in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth,' astonished and appalled to find themselves denounced as the common enemy of civilized Europe, under all these afflicting discouragements they never lost heart; and a few raw levies of squalid mountaineers or unwarlike fishermen, by the unaided resources of their own valour or conduct, successively dispersed the choicest armies, and baffled or discomfited the ponderous navies of one of the mightiest Empires of modern times."

Such heroism and devotion to their country, coupled with a keen and subtle intellect, and a marvellous aptitude for commerce, were surely no bad ingredients for the moulding of a young nation. Now, if it is to be proved that the independence of Greece has been a failure, it must be shown that population has decreased, revenue fallen, the internal condition of the country receded from bad to worse, and the lower classes more ignorant and discontented during the last thirty-six years. He could prove the reverse. In every village he believed there was a school, and the rising generation of Greeks generally was better educated than that of this country. Since 1831 the Greeks had rebuilt twenty-one towns destroyed in the war, besides founding ten new ones. In 1831 their revenue was only £178,000, and in 1864 it had risen to £781,000. In 1866, including the revenue of the Ionian Islands, the public income amounted to £1,081,000. Within the same period the population had nearly doubled. They had replanted their groves of olives and currants destroyed in the war. They had built over 5,000 vessels. They monopolized almost all the commerce of the Levant. At Odessa, Ibraila, and Galatz their flag outnumbered all the flags of the world. At Constantinople and Leghorn they were only second to the English; at Marseilles second only to the French. And all that progress had been achieved within thirty years, and in spite of a Government which the late Lord Carlisle described as the most inefficient, most corrupt, and most contemptible with which a nation ever was cursed. If the Greeks were turbulent and corrupt, it should be borne in mind what sort of education they had received during those thirty years. Their Legislative Chambers had been packed with Court satellites; their tribunals were subservient and venal; and the funds applicable for the construction of roads, bridges, harbours, and other internal improvements, were wasted or spent in bribery. His only wonder was that with such a training things were not worse than they were. But the greatness of a nation did not depend on its innocence, but on its energy. One predominant trait in the character of the Greek, whether he was found at Marseilles or Manchester, in Corfu or in Greece, was his intense longing for the unity of his race. The Ionians were perfectly well aware of the price they would have to pay for their dissociation from England, and no doubt the government of those islands had been bad since their annexation to Greece. But he was convinced, from all information he had received, that if they put it to the ballot among the Ionians whether they would return under the dominion of England, the enormous majority of them would prefer to remain united with their native land, with all their present inconveniences, rather than go back to the ease, security, and strong, good government they had left. There was something noble in that spirit; and the nation which was guided by such a star would not long suffer their country to be a failure. In conclusion, he hoped to elicit from the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) some intimation that the policy of the past would not be the policy of the present; but that the policy of the Foreign Office, as regarded the Christian dependencies of Turkey, would, as long as it was in his hands, rest on the assumption that in their gradual elevation to self-government and independence was the best hope for the happiness of many millions of our fellow-creatures, and for the preservation of peace, as well as for the true solution of the Eastern question. The hon. Member concluded by moving an Address for the Papers.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that Eastern questions stood on a different footing from that of other foreign questions in the Parliament of this country. The principle of non-intervention could scarcely be applied to them. Greece was under great pecuniary and other obligations to England. We had rendered her great services, and this fact certainly gave us a right to interfere so far as to make such suggestions as we thought might be useful to that country. We were a party to the transactions of 1856. We had a right, therefore, to see that the engagements entered into in that year with respect to the Christian subjects of the Turkish Government were faithfully carried out. By making over the Ionian Islands to Greece we had given one more proof of our interest in the Greeks. In times of difficulty Eastern nations turned to us, notwithstanding our principles of non-intervention. Thus, in 1862, on the occasion of the bombardment of Belgrade, neither the Austrian Consul nor the French Consul was applied to; but the assistance of the British Consul was sought for. When the Throne of Greece was declared vacant, the eyes of the Greek nation were turned towards England, in the hope that a Prince of our Royal Family should become their King. The part our Government had played in that transaction was as unfair—he might almost say dishonourable—as any ever played by a Government under anything like similar circumstances. We had in every way led the Greeks to suppose that we should allow a son of the Queen to accept the Throne if he should be elected King, when at the same time we had no intention that he should do anything of the kind. This had been done to play a trick upon Russia, and prevent the election of a Russian Prince. The only point in which he differed from his hon. Friend (Mr. Gregory) was in the rather strong language he had applied to the Turkish Government. He thought the crisis was one that called for the exercise of the spirit of moderation. As an example of this, he was happy to be able to point to the despatches of his noble Friend now at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord Stanley). The sound and moderate views displayed in those despatches did the greatest credit to the wisdom and judgment of his noble Friend, and would do more to raise the character of our foreign policy than those wild phrases to which we had been accustomed from the Foreign Office in former days, and which had led the people of other countries to expect intervention when there was no intention to offer it on their behalf. The real point, however, for their consideration at present was, what was the state of Crete? Had the conditions of the treaty between Turkey and the British Government been faithfully carried out? Any one who had read the blue book must feel distressed at the state of things therein described, and at the barbarities that were practised. He knew that the massacre of the 500 had been disputed; but the fact of its being even a report showed that things were in a very bad way. At Constantinople the Christians had justice done to them, but it was different in the distant provinces of the Turkish Empire. If we turned to Greece we should find that a great advance had been made during the last thirty-six years. From published Returns it appeared that—

“ In 1830 the population of independent Greece numbered 650,000 souls; it is now 1,250,000; nearly double, exclusive of the Ionian Isles. In 1833 the revenue of Greece was 7,950,000 drachmas, equal to £280,000. The Budget of 1865 was Greece, £833,920; Ionian Isles, £171,684; total, £1,005,604. In 1830 the total quantity of currants grown in Greece was 6,000 tons. It is now 40,000 tons, from which the British Government derives an annual revenue of about £300,000. In 1830 oil was an article of importation. It is now largely produced, and in seasons of a good crop the exports reach to 8,000 tons. In 1830 but few tons of figs were exported, now the exports reach 5,000 tons annually. In every village there is a free school where the poor can send their children. In many towns there are free colleges, and every person, irrespective of rank or station, can send his children to school or college free of all expense. It can be stated, without fear of contradiction, that the system of education in Greece is one of the most perfect in Europe. All masters of schools or colleges are bound to pass a rigid examination, and all professors, masters, and tutors are paid by Government. There is a national bank, the shares of which are at a high premium; a steam navigation company, successfully conducted; and there are some insurance companies. The Mercantile Marine of Greece numbers 5,000 flags, and there are shipbuilding yards in the island of Syra, Galaxidi, Poros, and other places in Greece. Athens, the capital of independent Greece, has now a population of 50,000 inhabitants; it had only 7,000 in 1830. It was then a miserable dilapidated town of mud huts and Turkish hovels. It is now much enlarged, and well lighted with gas, having stone and marble buildings. It has a university, colleges, free schools, asylums, observatories, libraries, museums, free hospitals. There are at present 1,500 students in Athens, coming from all parts of the East, and finishing their studies there."

It was charged against Turkey that 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 of Christians were ground down by 2,000,000 of Turks. In a book containing an account of the travels of two ladies, and published within the last two days, Miss Muir Mackenzie made this statement—

"The Christian community at Nori Bazaar is at the mercy of the Mussulmans; they enter houses both by day and by night, take what they choose, and behave as they will. Raise an arm or speak a word and you bring on yourself death or the loss of a limb; make a representation to the authorities, and you are ruined by the revenge of those of whom you dared to complain."

"We are suffering what no tongue can tell, what flesh and blood will endure no longer. Our lives, our properties, our wives, our children are at the mercy of a pack of robbers. Our governors, our judges, and police—all are thieves, villains, and bloodguilty. If one among them would do better than the rest—if he try to do us ever so little justice, the rest fall on him and destroy him."

It might be said that those ladies had been deceived by false testimony; but it would be admitted that no man was more complete master of Turkish questions than Lord Stratford. And what did he say, writing to Lord Malmesbury, of an interview which he had with the late Sultan on the 6th of October, 1858?—

"I submitted that little had been done in execution of the Hatti-Humayoun since its promulgation two years and a half ago; that a feeling of disappointment, and almost of despair, was on that account spreading throughout Europe; that the proofs of it were to be found not only in the remarks of private individuals and of public men in high stations, but in the Continental Press—in that of France particularly, and of late, to a certain extent, in the leading journals of England; that the necessity of a comprehensive reform having been recognised by the Ottoman Government, and corresponding measures proclaimed by his Majesty, it was most desirable to pass without any unnecessary delay from the old to the new system."

Such were the expostulations of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. What did Lord Russell say? He used the same language in 1860 respecting the outrages in Syria—

"This treachery, brutality, and cruelty on the part of those selected by the Sultan himself to govern his best provinces shows either some deep design to exterminate the Christians, or an unheard-of degree of weakness and apathy at Constantinople, or an amount of venality and corruption which it is difficult to credit. You must not be surprised that such feelings should be excited and such reflections made; nor would it be of any use to conceal from the Porte that either the whole system of the Ottoman Government must be replaced by one founded on integrity and justice, or the Sultan must prepare himself for the abandonment of his cause by his best and most persevering allies."

And then, what was the opinion of Sir Henry Bulwer? In a despatch dated April 24, 1860, Sir Henry Bulwer says—

"Wherever the Turk is sufficiently predominant to be implicitly obeyed, laziness, corruption, extravagance, and penury mark his rule; and wherever he is too feeble to exert more than a doubtful and nominal authority, the system of government which prevails is that of the Arab robber and the lawless Highland chieftain."

His hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Layard), who was formerly well prepared to defend the Turkish Government, would of course do so on the present occasion. He did not think that this was a fitting occasion to exasperate this bitter question by making an attack upon the Turkish Government; but still, it was right that the truth should be made known, and that the House should be aware that the stipulations entered into with the Turkish Government in 1856 had never been carried out. It would be idle to hold out hopes or to make menaces which we were not prepared to act upon. It was apparent that this country could have no desire, having gone to war at one time in favour of Turkey, now to weaken her by promoting insurrection in any of her dominions. He thought it would be better for the noble Lord to consider whether representations could not be brought to bear on the Turkish Government, and whether steps could not be taken in order to overrule the tyrannical conduct of the subordinates of that Government, for he believed that the central authorities at Constantinople were anxious to put an end to the present state of things. He would suggest, for instance, that our Consuls should have more authority. He hoped that this discussion would give hon. Members an opportunity of approaching the subject in a moderate spirit, and of rendering good to those who were oppressed.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Correspondence between the Foreign Office and Foreign Governments on the subject of the insurrection in Crete and the Turkish Fortresses in Serbia; and of any Reports from our Consular Agents on these subjects,"—(Mr. Gregory,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. LAYARD said, he very much regretted that his hon. Friend had thought fit to bring this question before the House at the present moment; more especially as, according to the latest information, the Ottoman Special Commissioner who had been sent to Crete had succeeded in bringing about a better feeling between the Christians and Mahomedans, both parties having sent representatives to Constantinople to state their grievances with the view of having them remedied. His hon. Friend commenced his speech by saying that he should be exceedingly calm and moderate while referring to the misfortunes which had befallen the Island of Crete. That promise, he was afraid, had not been kept. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that his hon. Friend made use of terms, with reference to the Turkish Government and the insurrection, which ought not to have been used, and which might possibly lead to additional trouble. No doubt his hon. Friend did not intend to bring about any such result; but he really was not aware of the importance of speeches of that kind. He might be quite sure that his speech, or a very improved version of it, would be "crowned," as a broadsheet of The Times had been, at Athens or elsewhere. If it were accompanied by the other speeches which would no doubt be made on the subject, the consequences might not be so serious. But, unfortunately, everything which tended to encourage the insurgents was published in Greece, and everything on the other side was suppressed, the result being that the unhappy people were led to believe that some intervention would take place on their behalf, and were urged on to take a course which could only lead to fresh disasters. He could not wonder that there should be much sympathy with the unhappy people of Crete; but still, there were times when a statesman should take a broad and general view of questions like this, and not allow himself to be influenced by these feelings of humanity alone. The question to be determined was, what should be done in order to lessen the amount of suffering and bloodshed. Expressions of sympathy on such occasions might lead to still greater disasters. He was certain that no one could feel more for the Cretans than the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), and no doubt that it was with great pain that he felt it his duty to give the orders directing English vessels of war not to aid the fugitives, and forbidding our Consular agents to distribute funds which had been raised on behalf of the distressed insurgents. That might, to some persons, appear unfeeling; but after all it was a wise and statesman-like course of proceeding, for if a different course had been adopted, the only result would have been that the hopes of the insurgents would have been raised in vain, and more bloodshed must have followed. He must also say that the speech of his hon. Friend, though eloquent, consisted principally of vague generalities, which were utterly useless as data upon which to form a reliable opinion, or, indeed, were only calculated to mislead. The first question was this—What were the grievances of the Cretan population? The hon. Gentleman had made an excellent speech, but he had no practical acquaintance with the country, or with the dispositions of the people of the East. It was all very well to write generalities in an essay, but when a statesman had to deal with a question the case was very different, and to act upon such generalities might do infinite harm. He confessed he should have liked to see among the papers—if such a document were in existence—some report from our Consul in the island as to whether the complaints of the people of Crete were justified or not. We could not discuss the grievances of the Cretans until we had received fuller information respecting them. The hon. Gentleman was under a mistake when he said that he (Mr. Layard) had always defended the Turkish Government when they had neglected their duty. On the contrary, no man felt more indignation than he did at some acts which had been committed by its authority. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. B. Cochrane) that it was the duty of the Powers who placed Turkey in her present position to see that she fulfilled her engagements, and he had always been ready to condemn the Turkish Government whenever it had failed in this respect. No one had more frequently exposed the laches of that Government than he had; but if these particular grievances complained of by the Cretans were looked into they would not be found so serious as was supposed, and were certainly not such as to justify civil war. According to our Consul, the first grievance of the Cretans was a vicious system of farming the tithes, whereby more than a tenth part of the produce was levied. The oppressive mode usually practised for enforcing payment was also complained of. The system, however, was an old one, and existed in Greece as well as in Turkey; it had, however, been greatly modified, and even abolished altogether in many provinces of Turkey, and, as administrative officers could be found, the Turks were further reducing the number of districts in which the taxes were sold by auction. The next grievance was that undue influence had been exercised on the part of Ismail Pasha, the Governor General, in the late popular election of members of the Demigerondia. No doubt, some influence might have been exercised, but in Crete the Christian population were a large majority, and in some places Christians were the sole population; and any influence which might have been exercised was probably owing to the Christians themselves, and could not have been such as to justify a rebellion. Of the third grievance—the baneful practice of seizing hostages—he knew nothing. The last was the delays attending the adjudication of civil and criminal cases, and such delays occurred in other States besides Turkey. But look at the statements of the Cretans themselves, of their grievances as complained of in their address to the Sultan. The letter addressed to the Great Powers which the hon. Member had read came from Athens or elsewhere, and was no more Cretan in its origin than the hon. Member's speech. The first statement spoke not of the oppressive nature of the taxes, but of a prayer of the people of Sfakia that they should continue to be exempt from its taxation, as they had hitherto been—no allegation being made that taxes was about to be imposed upon them. They complained, secondly, of the badness of the roads; but what were the facts? In 1858, the Turkish Government sent a Mr. Woodward, an English gentleman, to make roads, but the Cretans compelled the Turks to renounce the attempt; first, on the ground that their object was to give military access to their country; and second, that the inhabitants of the village were required to contribute towards the expense. Another complaint was that the mode of electing the representatives of the people was defective; but was Crete the only country in which such a complaint was made? They further complained that the oil-sellers were also money-lenders, and that there were no banks; but it would be hard to lay the blame of these circumstances on the Turkish Government. The fifth complaint referred to the rejection of Christian evidence in the Mahomedan Courts as contrary to the Hatti-Humayoun. It was true, and he regretted it, that in the Mekhiamah or purely Musulman Courts such evidence was not yet received; but, to remedy the evil, the Turks had established mixed tribunals in which Christian and Mahomedan evidence was equally received. There was no doubt that the Porte was bound to alter the law as regards the reception of Christian evidence; but some allowance must be made for the Turkish Government, which had great difficulty in contending with the feelings and prejudices of a dominant race that had been deeply rooted for centuries. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) was quite right in reminding the Turkish Government that they were bound to fulfil their pledges to Europe, and that the first duty of the Government to the people of Crete was to carry out those promises. The establishment of schools, which was the subject of the next complaint, depended to a great extent upon the Christians themselves; and there was scarcely a Christian village in Turkey in which there was not a school supported by the people. The education given was as good as that received by Christians who were under the government of Greece. Even in this country it was but recently that we had assisted education by public grants, and it was, perhaps, too much as yet to expect the Turkish Government to make large grants to promote Christian education. Still, they had done so; and he had been in schools which had received liberal support from the Government and from the Sultan himself. There was, however, no need to discuss those grievances, because they formed no part of the causes of the rebellion in Crete. The Cretans themselves admitted this in their address to the Consuls. The Turkish Government knew it from the outset, as did the Governments of France and England. The only Government which did not, was that of Russia. Baron Brunow, however, ultimately, as was seen in a quotation already made, admitted that the insurrection was mainly caused by foreign intervention, and had for its object annexation to Greece. These alleged grievances were not got up by the Cretans themselves, but by foreign agents, in order to justify the movement in the face of Europe, and, if possible, bring about the interference of a European Power. To get at the real history of the Cretan insurrection it was necessary to go a little further back. He would advise the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) to lay on the table reports sent to the Foreign Office in 1858, when a rebellion was threatened in Crete, upon the ground of the grievances of the population against the Turkish Government. At that time Sir Henry Bulwer sent from Constantinople to Crete a gentleman of the highest integrity and impartiality, and better acquainted with the languages, habits, and customs of the various populations of Turkey than most persons. This gentleman—Mr. Longworth—reported, that although the Turkish Government had not done all that it ought to have done, the alleged grievances had nothing to do with the anticipated revolt; and, so far from the Cretans complaining of the Turks, if there were cause of complaint it was on the part of the Turks against the Christians, who had got so powerful in Crete, and were so much encouraged and petted by the Pasha, that they even presumed upon this favour to carry off Mussulman children and convert them to Christianity. Then, as now, insurrection was fomented by intrigues from Athens, and the "Head Centre" was M. Canaris, the Greek Consul. The English Consul, Mr. Ongley, having sent impartial accounts to Constantinople, was, as usual, attacked and covered with abuse; but the reports of Mr. Longworth, who was sent to inquire into his conduct, satisfied not only the English Ambassador, but the French and Russian Ambassadors; and the result was that the exequatur of the Greek Consul was withdrawn to the satisfaction of all the Powers, the Greek Government never venturing to remonstrate.

The intrigue ceased as soon as the cause of it was removed; and for eight years Crete enjoyed peace. The breaking out of the great war last year was considered a fitting opportunity to get up the Eastern question, and Crete was more at hand than Servia. The movement for independence and annexation to Greece was instigated, directed, and supplied with money and volunteers from Athens, without which the Cretans themselves, had they risen of their own accord, would have submitted long ago. He had read with great satisfaction the Correspondence produced by the Foreign Office. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had throughout taken a most wise and statesmanlike course—the only course that could be taken by a responsible Minister. It was all very well in that House to declaim against the Turks, but it was another matter when it came to practical statesmanship. The noble Lord had urged the removal of all just causes of complaint; he had reminded the Porte of its obligations to Europe; he had urged upon the Porte, in suppressing the revolt, to treat prisoners with kindness and humanity, and to endeavour, as much as possible, to prevent the effusion of blood; and, at the same time, he had wisely entered a protest against the course taken by Greece, which sought, not the welfare and happiness of the people of Crete, but the gratification of ambitious designs. His hon. Friend had said that France was pursuing in the East a much more enlightened policy than ours. That might be, but he rejoiced that, in the Cretan question at least, France had gone entirely with us, and the other Powers—including Russia herself—had come round to the same way of thinking. He protested against the proceedings of Greece as unjust, unfair, and wicked, calculated only to raise constant rebellions in the East, and to destroy there every hope of the Christian population developing their resources, increasing their wealth, and placing themselves on a par with their Mahomedan neighbours. As regarded Greece, Turkey had been a good neighbour; she had fulfilled all her engagements to her. There had been times when Turkey might have done Greece the greatest harm, when she might have taken advantage of her internal condition to strike the severest blow, and from the conduct of Greece she would have been justified in doing so. Turkey, in fact, had been most unjustly treated by Greece. From the time of her acknowledgment of Greece he defied any man to say that Turkey had broken one of her engagements to that kingdom. Hon. Gentlemen had talked of the increasing wealth of Greece. But how had it been chiefly obtained? To whom was it owing? To the liberality and neighbourly feeling of Turkey, who had freely opened her coasting trade to Greece, and had placed Greek subjects on the same footing as her own. They had said that the revenues of Greece had increased from £200,000 to £900,000. Well, but if Greece had obtained such an enormous increase of revenue, why had she not paid what she owed to other nations? Had Turkey acted in that way? Had she not paid her debts? [An hon. MEMBER: How?] He cared not how; but she had paid her debts, and at very great sacrifices. So little regard had Greece for her international relations, that we find from the despatches on the table that M. Tricoupi, the Greek Foreign Minister, actually claimed a right to excite insurrection amongst the populations of Turkey, and coolly proposed to desist from doing so in Thessaly and Epirus if the European Powers would connive at his proceedings in Crete. What other nation would tolerate the course which Greece had pursued? Turkey, by the simplest possible means, might have stopped the trade of Greece—she might have turned the Greek merchants out of her ports and cities, but she abstained from doing so. He must say we were in the habit of treating Turkey very unfairly. Before a rebellion broke out we prevented her from interfering. When the rebellion had broken out we condemned her for needless severity in suppressing it. We accused her of not giving liberties and privileges to her Christian subjects, and the moment they were given we connived at their being turned against herself. All he asked was that she should be treated with common justice. He would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), whether that could be called a liberal and Christian policy which denied the commonest justice to a Turk because he happened to be a Mahomedan in religion, or that maintained that what was right as regarded a Christian was wrong with respect to a Turk. But that was the kind of language that was adopted by hon. Gentlemen in that House when they talked of expelling the Turks and giving the Greeks their rights. The Turks in Europe were very much like what the English were in Ireland, and if there was a difference it was in their favour. In parts of Turkey—such as Roumelia—the Mahomedan owners of the land were for the most part, no doubt, descendants of the original conquerors, amongst whom it had been partitioned, as amongst the English conquerors in Ireland; but in Bosnia, Epirus, and Crete, the land was held by the descendants of the ancient Christian proprietors, who had changed their religion at the time of the conquest—men whose land-rolls and pedigrees went, perhaps, further back than those of any families in this country—they went back beyond the Middle Ages. Well, were they not just as much entitled to their lands as Christian people? But his hon. Friend would say, "Nobody wants to turn them out." [Mr. GREGORY: Hear, hear!] That might be the opinion of the hon. Gentleman; but had he ever spoken to a Christian of Greece, of Serbia, or of Bosnia, on the subject? Their opinion was not that the Mahomedans should be allowed to remain in the country, but that every man, woman, and child should be dispossessed of his land and property, as had already been done in Serbia, and turned out of Europe. But was it so easy to do that? Did his hon. Friend know what the amount of the Mahomedan population of Turkey was? According to Mr. Longworth, it was not far from 4,000,000; according to German authorities, it was 3,500,000. It would be no easy thing, to say nothing of the question of humanity and justice, to drive such a population as that from house and home, from goods and lands, to starve. This was not merely a political question, it was a religious question, also, and one not merely between the Mahomedans and the Greeks. Such was the religious animosities amongst the populations of the East, that if they gave power to the Greeks to-day, the Greeks would, he ventured to say, expel all the Roman Catholics or compel them to become Greeks. But there was another question. Would the Turks consent to be handed over to the Greeks? Let his hon. Friend think for a moment on the infinite mischief to which such opinions as these propagated by influential people might lead. In the first place, the Turks in Europe were a warlike population, and they knew perfectly well what the intentions of the Christians were. Did his hon. Friend suppose they would give up, without a struggle, their lands, goods, and houses, and allow themselves, their wives and children, to be driven out of Europe as starving outcasts? The only effect of the policy advocated by his hon. Friend, if adopted by any Minister whatever, would be to excite such a rising of Mahomedans in Turkey in Europe, and such a massacre, as the world had never seen. And if the Mahomedans were driven out through the active intervention of foreign Powers, and after a prolonged war—for it could be accomplished by no other means—what would be the consequence? There would be 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 of women and children thrown starving on the world, in addition to a terrible slaughter on both sides, and what man would take upon his shoulders the responsibility for that and all the blood that would be shed? It was all very well for his hon. Friend to disclaim any such intentions. But with the Turks it would be a struggle for life or death, and they would make it so when the time came. There was a second consideration. We, like the Turks, governed races from which we differed in religion, and who were impatient of our rule. We held many millions of Mahomedans in India under our sway, and they might say, "If Mahomedans have no right to govern Christians, Christians have no right to govern Mahomedans." And if they found us backing up the Christians in murdering the Turks, who would guarantee the security of affairs in India? Let his hon. Friend only turn to the history of the rebellion in India, and he would see how much it had been influenced by events in Europe. It was of the utmost importance that this country should keep a just position between Christians and Mahomedans, and not sacrifice the Mahomedans to the Christians, any more than the Christians to the Mahomedans. He wished to see both races fairly treated, and that was the principle for which he had always contended. And if his hon. Friend wished for a proof of the good effect which that policy had exercised in the East, he will find it in a despatch amongst the papers from our Consul in Epirus, who describes the result upon the Mahomedans of that country of the fear that we were about now to abandon it, and to sacrifice Turks to Christians. Suppose the Cretans had obtained what their friends at Athens desired—annexation to Greece—would they have improved their position? The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had put the case so fairly in a despatch to Mr. Erskine, under date of December 11, that he hoped he might be allowed to quote from it. The noble Lord said—

"It can scarcely be doubted that if the insurrection had not been countenanced and supported from Greece tranquillity would have been long since restored; and if the King or his Government should urge, in justification of their conduct, that they are seeking to improve the condition of the Christians in Candia by emancipating them from subjection to the Sultan and incorporating them in the kingdom, you will not disguise from them that, looking to the results of the recent incorporation of the Ionian States with the Greek Kingdom, and to the disorders which prevail, and appear to be on the increase, throughout the Greek Provinces, it may well be doubted whether the Candiots would derive any substantial benefit from the transfer of their allegiance. Certainly no impartial person would view the present state of things in the Ionian Islands, and in Greece itself, as affording encouragement or justification for an attempt to bring other countries under the same Government, however faulty may be the system of administration under which such countries may now be held."

Any one reading the blue book would rise from it with the conviction that Mr. Erskine had shown a rather unfair bias against the Turks, and had too readily credited the stories of the Greeks to their prejudice; yet even he, writing to Lord Stanley on the 29th of December, said—

"But the most serious statement I have yet heard for the cause of the insurrection is that a very bad feeling has sprung up between the natives and the Hellenic volunteers. If they fall out thus early in the day, what will it be should the Hellenic Government hereafter be permitted to extend its baneful rule to this unhappy island?"

His hon. Friend had spoken of the miserable condition of Crete, but that island was not overrun with brigands as Greece was, a person being scarcely able to leave Athens without falling into their hands. Then, with regard to the Ionian Islands, had he read the reports received from our Consuls at Zante, Corfu, and elsewhere? Those reports stated that the improvements and public works which the English Government carried out were all neglected and falling into ruin; that justice is no longer administered; that that distinguished patriot Lombardo, whose cause the hon. Gentleman had advocated, the great regenerator of those islands, the great promoter of their removal from British rule and of their annexation to Greece, was keeping Zante in a state of terrorism such as had never been equalled in any country. He sent bands of armed men, who went about murdering those who refused to vote for him or to support his plans. People were assassinated by them in the open streets and in coffee-houses, nobody, not even the police, daring to interfere. These atrocities had risen to such a pitch, that the Greek Government were obliged to send an honest man thither as chief of the police; but Lombardo soon afterwards became Minister of the Interior, and this officer, who was succeeding in placing some check upon the anarchy and licence which prevailed, was speedily deprived of his office. It was evident, therefore, that Crete would gain nothing by annexation to Greece. It had been suggested that Crete should have what is termed her "autonomy," like Serbia and the Danubian Principalities. But Crete, unlike those provinces, had a mixed population, and the difficulty was to provide a form of government which would deal fairly with both Mahomedans and Christians. The Mussulman population was fixed by some at 90,000, and by others at 60,000. He would take a mean between these figures, and would assume that the number was 70,000 or 75,000. Now it would be manifestly as unfair, knowing the antagonism which existed between them, to put these Mahomedans, who were for the most part landed proprietors in the island, and just as much Cretans by race and language as the Greeks themselves, under the Christian rule, as to put the Christians under the Mahomedan rule. In some of the other dependencies of Turkey autonomy was enjoyed, but the population there was not of so mixed a character. In Samos, for instance, which was governed by a Christian and by local councils and laws, the Mahomedans were so few that they could not be taken into account. In Crete, however, the circumstances were different; and it would, he thought, be wise and prudent for the Turkish Government to find some plan, as by the Governors being alternately Christians and Mahomedans, which would satisfy, and protect the rights of, both Mahomedans and Christians. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) would, no doubt, be able to make some suggestion with this object. Before leaving the subject of the annexation of Crete to Greece, he wished to make a remark. With respect to the Ionian Islands, he thought we were right in giving them up, because we occupied an invidious position from which we derived no advantage. We allowed the freest expression of opinion, and that freedom consisted in allowing those who were adverse to English rule to agitate as much as they liked, while there was no demonstration of opinion on the other side. The result was that a great outcry was raised against us by Lombardo and others, who were supposed to represent the popular feeling, and the opinion spread throughout Europe that our rule was odious to the people. He regretted that our connection with the Islands had ceased, not for our own sakes but for the sake of the Christians of the East; for though, no doubt, there were faults on our part, our government was by far the best in the East. In the Ionian Islands there was a large and contented population, who while under our protection were very lightly taxed, and were gradually being trained to habits of self-government, for which, doubtless, the next generation would have been fitted. They enjoyed a national Assembly and a free press, and formed a little Greek community around which other Greek communities might have gathered, and from which they might have learnt the art of self-government. The spectacle of an island so well administered would have afforded them a valuable example, and have stimulated them to establish something on the same model in their own provinces. All hope of this was now destroyed, and he thought this a great loss to the Christians of the East. His hon. Friend had denounced the Turks for the barbarities which were imputed to them, but he utterly disbelieved many of those stories, and anybody reading the Correspondence would see that they had, for the most part, been disproved. Barbarities had, no doubt, been committed, such as required no exaggeration, but they had been practised by the Christians as well as by the Turks, the former perhaps being the more ingenious in their tortures. But he could not help pointing out this great difference, that whilst the Ottoman Government condemned and did their best to punish them, though they could not always reach their officials, the Greek Government, without exception, palliated or justified them. The humane manner in which the Turkish Government treated even Greek emissaries who were captured red-handed, was acknowledged even by the prisoners themselves. One of them, M. Manos, a Greek officer, who was taken in the redoubt at Vrysses, was stated in a despatch by Mr. Erskine, at page 93 of the "Correspondence," to have written to his family to inform them how humanely, and even generously, he was treated by Mustapha Pasha. The testimony of other Greek prisoners was to the same effect; and we find the Turkish Government actually sending their own vessels of war to transport back to Greece the volunteers who had been the principal cause of the insurrection in the island, and had caused so much Turkish blood to be shed. What course would Christian nations have pursued under similar circumstances? Let us look a little more at home, and consider what had been done by ourselves in the East and in the West under similar circumstances. Even Mr. Erskine, in a despatch, in which on rather dubious authority he imputed great atrocities to the Turks, was obliged to add that similar barbarities were perpetrated by the Christians. No doubt horrible deeds had been committed, but these were inevitable whenever an insurrection was raised, and whenever two barbarous races came into collision. He had himself seen barbarities practised by both sides, and could tell stories which would make his hon. Friend's hair stand on end. A friend of his saw the bodies of fifteen Turks who, having been captured in Epirus, had been covered with pitch and then set on fire and burnt slowly to death. A Greek patriot crossed over from Greece to liberate the suffering Christians in Turkey, and what he did was to carry off a whole school of Christian children near Monastir, boys of eight or ten years old, whose ears he cut off and sent to their parents with an intimation that unless a certain ransom was paid their heads would follow. They were saved chiefly by the intercession of an English officer. Some doubt having been expressed as to the truth of the story, the Consul at Monastir actually enclosed in a letter to the Embassy at Constantinople some of the ears thus sent to the unhappy parents. He himself witnessed the horrors committed by Greek "patriots" who were sent to liberate Thessaly. Their course was marked by robbery, pillage, and violation, and the population were obliged to appeal to Fuad Pasha to protect them from their liberators. He did not cite these facts as any justification of the Turks, but only to show with what barbarous races we had to deal. Both races were equally barbarous, and the only way to put a stop to their barbarities was not to encourage one party against the other, but to bring the public opinion of Europe to bear upon the Governments of both Turkey and Greece. The Christians had the advantage of a press. The moment a Mussulman, whether by accident or design, killed a Christian, there were letters in every newspaper in Europe denouncing the barbarity of the Turks; but we never heard of the atrocities committed by the Christians, except occasionally, when a British officer happened to be an eye-witness of them. Had not the officers of a British man-of-war witnessed the horrible and disgraceful attack of the population of the Piræus on the Greek volunteers who had been brought back to Greece by the humane exertions of the Turks, we should not have had the account of that attack contained in the blue book—we should not have known that some of these unfortunate people had had their brains knocked out with paving stones, and had been held under water until they were drowned, only because they had returned from a hopeless insurrection. Fortunately, we had a Consul at Syra, or we should never have heard of the murder of an unfortunate Mahomedan who happened to land there from a steamer, and whose only crime was being "a Turk." Yet such things happened almost daily, and it would be found on examination that as many atrocities were committed by Christians as by Mahomedans; while, if the government were reversed, the atrocities that would be resorted to by the former would be infinitely greater than those that had ever been committed by the Turks. This was a bold thing to say, but he stated it because he knew the hatred which was borne by the Christians towards the Mahomedans, and the religious animosities that existed between the Christians of different sects. He did not wish to take the part of the Turks; but he thought it unfair to condemn them merely because of their religion, and he desired to take an impartial view. It was all very well to have these debates which only tended to encourage the Christians to rise against the Turkish Government, but those who suffered were beyond the help of the House. Nor could they hope anything from Greece. No service was done to them by encouraging them to rebel. They were not to be liberated—if they were to be liberated at all—or created into an independent Power, and the Turkish population expelled, without the aid and direct assistance of the European Powers. No doubt, if the European Powers could be got together and brought to an agreement they might expel the Turks, at an enormous cost. Until, however, the European

Powers were prepared to intervene—and modern policy did not run greatly in favour of intervention—it was only doing those unhappy Christians an incalculable mischief to encourage them in these hopeless rebellions. He believed there was a future in store for the Christian population of Turkey. They were rapidly improving in wealth and intelligence; and this fact, which had been generally admitted, and indeed urged in their favour in this debate, did not agree with the terrible accounts of Turkish oppression and misrule which were given by his hon. Friend. If the English ladies, to whom his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had referred, could only relate the idle stories that were told to every traveller in Turkey, they might as well have staid at home. He had heard similar stories over and over again. If life and property were so insecure as they described them to be, was it possible for the Christian population to go on improving in wealth and intelligence? The Turks were now under the influence of the public opinion of Europe. Since he first knew Turkey an incalculable improvement had taken place. Some years ago Christians were not allowed to ride on horses in certain towns in Turkey, and were compelled to wear certain dresses. Those restrictions, and nearly all others which made a distinction between the two creeds, were now done away with, and the two races were beginning to find that it was for the advantage of each that the rights and property of the other should be respected. Events were rapidly bringing the two races together, and the only danger was lest animosities and mutual hatred between them should be kindled by Motions of this kind, and by injudicious or ambitious foreign interference. He felt certain a time would come when some method would be found by these populations themselves for coming to a better understanding. The Turks would see it to be to their advantage to concede to the Christians the rights they ought to possess, and the Christians on their part would find that the Turks also had their just rights. Thus mutual concessions would be made, and a form of government might be ultimately devised in which all sects would be fairly represented, and the rights and privileges of all be respected without great and manifest injustice being done to either Turks or Christians.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he

agreed with much that had fallen from his hon. Friend opposite; but with regard to the future, he had entirely failed to shadow forth any solution of the question. He believed that under certain conditions and stipulations there were countries under Turkish dominion more fortunate than those under certain other Powers, with higher pretensions to civilization. The course which he recommended last year in the case of the Danubian Principalities had since been carried out, and those countries had been entirely liberated from the intervention of Turkey. The negotiations had resulted in the abandonment of the quasi-rights of the Sultan, and in the acceptance of Prince Charles of Hohenzollern as Hospodar of Wallachia on almost his own terms. The only interest that England had in the matter was that the populations of the East should live harmoniously together, and England was the only European Power which had no interest in the acquisition of any fresh territory. He thought the prudence displayed by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord Stanley) was the best quality to be exercised in a case of this kind, though it was different to the adventurous policy which they had formerly been accustomed to at the Foreign Office, and which they at one time used to hold in high estimation. He thought the way in which Moldavia and Wallachia had been dealt with ought to be the manner in which the Turks should deal with Serbia. Every one knew that after a long and gallant struggle Serbia had gained substantial independence, and that the last remnant of Turkish rule consisted in the possession of the fortresses along the line of the Danube. These fortresses were perfectly useless to the Turkish authorities. They consisted for the most part of dilapidated battlements, which could be commanded from every surrounding hill. The only one which was of any military value was that of Belgrade; but he believed the main reason that induced the Turks to maintain it was one of a sentimental character, because it was said to be one of the old historical fortresses of Turkey. But it had belonged to Austria as well as to Turkey, having in fact been taken and re-taken many times within the last 400 years, till at last by treaty provision it was made a Turkish fortress. The city of Belgrade, the capital of the province, was placed in the position of a mere suburb of the castle, and the palace of the Prince was within three-quarters of a mile from the fortress, and therefore within reach of its guns, which the bombardment of 1862 had so fully demonstrated. The occupation, therefore, of that fortress by the Turks was a standing insult as well as a menace to the Servians, and it was impossible that the city could flourish while it and its inhabitants were liable to be annihilated at any moment that the Turkish employés chose to bombard them. In the interest of the Porte herself it was desirable that she should give up these fortresses, which cost her some £200,000 a year, while the entire tribute she obtained from Serbia was only £20,000. At this moment he was afraid that the demands of Serbia were on the point of reaching their climax, and that they would no longer remain in their present state of humiliation. There would be an outbreak ere long in that country, if the grievance he was referring to was not redressed—which would be very likely to extend into other districts. He hoped, therefore, the noble Lord would take the example of the proceedings with regard to the Danubian Provinces, and urge on the Porte to follow that example in regard to Serbia, by yielding to the strongly-expressed wishes of the population and withdrawing from the fortresses. He recommended these considerations to the noble Lord, and he left the case with great confidence in his hands. He knew the calm and clear reason which operated in his mind; and though, as he had said, these were not the qualities which they had been accustomed to see in the Foreign Office, yet they were not the less valuable on that account.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I should be very sorry if, with regard to Turkey, we were not to treat her with the respect that is due to an independent Power responsible for the government of an extended territory. At the same time, with reference to many of her provinces, and even her general concerns, circumstances have at various times placed her in such a position that we are entitled, and indeed in many cases bound, to entertain questions affecting her internal relations to her people such as it would be impertinence to entertain in respect to most other foreign countries. With so much of apology, I must say I cannot help being of opinion that there is great good sense and justice in most of what has fallen from the hon. Member in regard to the case of Serbia. We cannot expect Turkey to conform her notions to ours. All we can expect is that where she has contracted either legal or moral engagements she should fulfil them, and that where she is under no such engagement she should lend a willing ear to counsels in themselves judicious, and which aim solely at the promotion of her interests. When we reduce the question of the retention of the fortresses of Serbia by Turkey to this issue, the sole issue—how far such retention can serve the interests of the Ottoman Government—it appears to me impossible that that question can receive any answer but one in the negative. I am not aware of any purpose of utility, whether for peace at home or for defence against foreign Powers, which Turkey can accomplish by military possession of Serbia; while, unquestionably, the monetary burden which it imposes on her adds to the inconvenience of her financial condition, always difficult. At the same time, such possession keeps up a painful feeling of irritation between the people of Serbia and those of Turkey, which is a constant source of danger. I cannot, therefore, but subscribe to the opinion of the hon. Member, and hope that at the present or some other time, an opportunity will be taken of tendering some friendly counsel on the subject from this country to the Ottoman Porte. But a great part of the interesting discussion of this evening has been devoted to a point which at this time will enlist more of the sympathy of the House—namely, that connected with the—I do not know whether I should say recent, or still existing disturbances in Crete. I am hardly able to subscribe to the proposition we have heard to-night that the grievances of the island of Candia have had nothing to do with the production of those disturbances. I expressed a hope on a former occasion that when Her Majesty's Government laid the papers on the table, those papers would show that the Ottoman Government had fulfilled its engagements—I do not mean written engagements only, but moral, substantial engagements to Europe about the existence of which there can be no doubt. If there has been a prompt and faithful performance of the stipulations of what is known as the Hatti-Humayoun of 1856, I am not able—after reading those papers—to affirm that they show it. This book does not contain evidence to that effect; but if the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), with his more extended and accurate knowledge, is able in his place to say that Turkey has completely and fully accomplished the engagements she entered into, I would receive that assurance with great satisfaction and willingly bow to the opinion issuing from such a source. For upon that question depends another—namely, whether the responsibility of those disturbances of Crete, and of the barbarity, the cruelty, and devastation which have taken place there, lies at the door of those immediately concerned in the outbreak or of the Government under which they live. I do not think after the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) it can rightly be said that the rights and claims of the Turkish Government are inadequately or inefficiently or even only sufficiently represented in this House. I must say that the case of Turkey against Crete has been stated by my hon. Friend much better than it is stated in the document itself contained in this blue book. But it is fair to admit, and I should not hesitate to admit, that, in addition to any grievance that might have arisen from the non-performance of the Hatti-Humayoun, there has been the deeper grievance resulting from the strong Hellenic feeling which pervades the population. Some at least of the population would be disposed to avail themselves of every opportunity to give effect to that sentiment of nationality. I also agree with what has been stated with great force by my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Galway, as to the extreme responsibility incurred by those who in this House deliver statements which, going forth, perhaps, in a garbled form to other countries, may be the means of fomenting disturbances or of prolonging efforts which, whether they be right or whether they be wrong in themselves tend in the actual condition of things to expose to greater dangers those by whom they are undertaken. In such a question as that of the liberation of Greece, the statesmen of England would have made themselves deeply responsible if they had encouraged the people of that country in their struggle for freedom. I would not venture to say one word which would have the effect of encouraging the people of Crete to throw off the Ottoman rule. But as far as regards the stipulations of the Hatti-Humayoun, we are not only entitled from our position to advise Turkey in her own interests, in her regard to humanity, in her sense of justice, in her desire to be a civilized European Power, to fulfil those engagements; but we are also entitled to say to her that her fulfilment of those stipulations is a matter of moral faith, an obligation to which she is absolutely bound, and the disregard of which will entail upon her disgrace in the eyes of Europe. I am happy to observe that, as far as I can gather from the papers before us, the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord Stanley) has exhibited much discretion and forbearance in this matter. I agree in the opinion that he rightly determined to observe and to enforce the laws of neutrality, even though at the expense of the calls of mere humanity. The calls of mere humanity it was his duty to repress, and he has repressed them. It was right and wise to say that he would not encourage the separation of Candia from the Ottoman Empire; and it was also right and wise to point out to the Ottoman Porte, as he has done, especially in his despatch of the 17th of January of this present year, that the true policy of the Ottoman Empire, its only policy—the only possible course which it could take in relation to the Powers of Europe, with peace and satisfaction to others as well as to itself—was to do full justice to the principles of the Hatti-Humayoun, and to allow the Christians under their rule to feel that, though nominally under the sway of a Mussulman Power, they enjoyed all the advantages of a Christian Government. I cannot but hope that, within the last year, we have seen a step in advance, in that policy adopted not at the first moment, but after a brief delay—which it is not for us to complain of—in the case of the Danubian Principalities. The literal application of it may be impossible; but I hope that the principle acted upon in that instance may be adopted throughout the European provinces of the Ottoman Porte. My hon. Friend the Member for Southwark has pointed out, and the noble Lord points out, the difficulty in the case of Candia, which arises from the presence of a Mahomedan population, which, though numerically small as compared with the Christian population, is in possession of domination and ascendancy from ancient times, and is in a more powerful position in consequence of the property and rank which belong to its members. I do not, therefore, pretend to say that the same arrangements as those which have been adopted elsewhere are applicable to Crete; but we are entitled to require from Turkey the execution of her literal engagements, and we are entitled to recommend to her such a policy as the noble Lord has put before her in his despatches. I trust that what has been done by Turkey in the Danubian Principalities may promise for the future the existence of such relations between that country and her provinces as will conduce in the highest degree to the interest of both parties.

LORD STANLEY : Sir, I do not feel it my duty to take part in that animated controversy respecting the comparative merits of the Turkish and the Christian races which has been carried on with so much ability on both sides of the House, and with a knowledge of local details probably unrivalled in this country, by the hon. Member for Southwark. Neither shall I go into the question of the foreign policy on Eastern matters, pursued by England in former times. Every age and every generation has its own policy—one suited to its ideas and its wants. My business is not to question what was done in former times, but simply to explain, and if necessary—I am happy to say from the course of the debate that on this occasion it does not seem to be necessary—to vindicate the course which the present Government have taken. Two questions have been raised—one relating to Crete, the other to Servia. As to Servia the explanation will be brief, but I trust satisfactory. We have, after much deliberation and in concert with other Powers, advised the Porte to make such concessions as appear to us to be necessary to meet the natural and reasonable wishes of the Servians. We hope that those concessions will bring about a good understanding, and we have recommended them with all sincerity in the interest of the Turkish Empire, because it is impossible to doubt that a serious outbreak in Servia at the present time would be one of the greatest misfortunes that could occur to Turkey. We have endeavoured to offer that advice in such a manner as to leave with the Porte itself, to whom it more properly belongs, the initiative of making those concessions which we consider necessary; because it is obvious that they would lose much of their grace and value if they were made, or seemed to be made, at the dictation of any foreign Power. I am not able at present to say more than that the representations which we have thought it our duty to address to the Porte have been made in a spirit of moderation—in a spirit which is fair, friendly, and conciliatory. I hope, therefore, that these representations will not be wholly ineffective. At the same time, no positive answer has been received, and I think the House will agree with me that while correspondence is still being carried on, and while negotiations are pending, it would not conduce to the object which we all have in view if the papers asked for by the hon. Gentleman were laid upon the table. When the matter is settled I will produce them. With regard to the perhaps larger, certainly more urgent, question of Crete, it is even less necessary that I should explain in detail the views of the Government; because those views have been stated very fully upon many occasions in the papers which I presented a few days ago. I have been asked by several speakers what we consider to be the real origin of the insurrection. A more difficult question it is impossible to put or to answer. It is very hard to get at the truth in any of these matters. Impartial witnesses are few, and, as a general rule, statements received from the two sides are not merely divergent and conflicting, but absolutely and flatly contradictory. I do not for a moment doubt that local grievances have to some extent existed, and I do not doubt that the administration of Candia has not been what we should consider a good one in a civilized country accustomed to regular Government. But what is the precise magnitude of the grievances of which the island may have had to complain is a question which I am utterly unable to answer. However, whether local grievances have had any part in causing this insurrection or not—in my opinion they have had some part—I am clear that they have not been the sole causes. There is another explanation which more readily occurs. I think it has been from the first—or at least from the moment when it began to be serious—a movement, not for the redress of any local abuses, but a movement of a religious and a national character in favour of entire separation from the Turkish Government. Nor is it unnatural that a feeling of that kind should have existed. These Hellenes—for, no doubt, the centre of the movement was in Greece, though the disturbances broke out beyond the limits of that country—had observed the great success attending other movements in favour of nationalities. They had seen Italy made a nation, and Germany to a great extent united, and I do not think it unnatural that they should believe that their time had come. The movements they had witnessed in other countries re-acted upon them. Then I have been asked questions as to acts

ceive that assurance with great satisfaction and willingly bow to the opinion issuing from such a source. For upon that question depends another—namely, whether the responsibility of those disturbances—Crete, and of the barbarity, the and devastation which have taken there, lies at the door of those concerned in the outbreak or ment under which they think after the speech of the Member for South—can rightly be said claims of the Turk—adequately or insufficiently represent say that the has been a better the contain to admi' the fo-

most horrible story of all—that of women and children been allured to the shore by a Turkish vessel hoisting the English flag, and then fired upon—has been entirely denied on the part of the Turkish officers, and, for the credit of human nature, I hope it is not true. As to what has happened there, I do not know that it is much worse than what we unhappily know to be true
—I mean that attack by the mob of the Pirmas on their own volunteers, in which several lives were lost, and where there was no other provocation than that these unfortunate men had returned home unsuccessful. It is just also to say that whatever acts of cruelty may have been committed by the troops—and where irregular troops and Albanians have been employed these are almost sure to happen—there is not the slightest evidence to show that they have been in any case sanctioned, or even tolerated, by the Turkish Government. The prisoners who have fallen into the hands of the Turkish officers have been, as a rule, humanely and fairly treated. I do not know, after the very indulgent criticism which has been passed in this House on the policy of the Government, whether it is necessary for me to enter into any vindication of that policy.
Some remarks have been made as to the decision to which the Government came when they were requested by several persons to send ships of war to take off the refugees. We never came to a decision with more regret. I myself never came to a decision with more personal pain; but never, also, with a clearer conviction that* obligation and the he were taking the only which was open to us circumstances. It is simply for any one who did not closely the insurrection, to understand the eagerness with which the slightest of armed intervention on the part of the Western Powers was looked for by these insurgents, or the readiness with which any act which could be distorted into an act of intervention was caught up by them. I am quite sure that if we had given the assistance which was desired it would have been considered as a symptom of armed interference on the part of the European Powers; would have prolonged the hopeless struggle; and been in consequence the cause of ten times as much suffering as has been actually undergone. There is another point of view in which we were bound to consider this question. There are duties of neutrality, and though no one wishes to overstrain them where considerations of humanity come in, they nevertheless constitute an obligation which it is impossible to disregard. But to send troops in the rear of an insurrection for the purpose of taking away non-combatants or of assisting on the spot the families of those who are at that very time in arms, is giving aid and comfort to one of the belligerents. To my mind it is clear that that would be a breach of neutrality. It is certain that we should not have been allowed to take such a course in the case of a war between two strong European Powers, and I do not think there ought to be two rules, one for strong Powers, and one for weak ones. As regards the general question under discussion, there were only three alternatives which the Government could adopt. One was to carry out the principle of non-intervention in the strictest and most literal sense, by taking no notice at all of the whole matter. That alternative, however, I may at once dismiss from consideration. Another, which has sometimes been urged upon us, was, "Why, if you were giving any advice in the matter, did you not at once advise the cession of the island to Greece, and so put an end to the whole dispute." In answering that, I will not refer to the state of the Greek kingdom. I think that the truth as to the present state of Greece lies somewhere between the rose-coloured view of my hon. Friend behind me and the gloomy picture painted by the hon. Member for Southwark. It is impossible to say that the state of Greek kingdom is at present satisfied but I do not think that alone is a which ought to have stood in the annexation, had it been on other expedient. The Greeks are a most intelligent and patriotic race. They have had to struggle against immense difficulties, and have had but a very limited time for exercising their unfettered energies. It is less than a quarter of a century since they became possessed of a Constitution. Under these circumstances, we ought to make every allowance for them, and ought not to bear too hardly upon them for what they may have done or left undone. But the reason which weighed with us against advising the annexation of Crete to the Greek kingdom was, first, the certainty that such advice would not be listened to. The Porte would not have been willing to listen for a moment to a suggestion that it should surrender any part of its dominions except under coercion, which is not the policy of this, or, as far as I know, of any other European country to employ. In the next place, if we gave advice professedly in the interest of Turkey we were bound in justice to look at the matter from a Turkish as well as from a Cretan point of view, and I think the Porte might fairly say that whether or not it would be an advantage to be rid of this one disaffected province, still the precedent would be almost fatal to the Empire; because if it came to be understood that in any province an insurrection were to be followed by a recommendation on the part of a European Power that the province should be ceded, that would be a premium on disaffection, and in process of time the Empire would be dismembered. Then I come to the third course, and pass on to the friendly criticism of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). The right hon. Gentleman rather hinted than said that we might have pressed our advice a little more strongly on the Porte, and he reminded me of the rights which, by the Treaty of 1856, the Christian subjects of the Porte possessed. I do not deny those treaty obligations. I assent to the doctrine laid down in respect to them; but we must remember that a demand for a separate administration for Crete was far more than could be claimed by any treaty rights, which relate to the toleration of Christians in matters of religion and their admission to give evidence on equal terms with other persons in courts of justice.

So much we should have been entitled to demand for them; anything more could only be the subject of request and advice. In matters of this sort there is a double danger to be avoided. If it be thought that you give advice merely to satisfy your own conscience, and that you do not care about the matter, then your advice will lose much of its effect. If, on the other hand, you pressed your advice strongly, then the Porte might turn round and say that they yielded because they could not help themselves, declaring at the same time that you, and not they, were responsible for the consequences. And then you come to the most hopeless and impossible of all political devices—the attempt to govern a great Empire like Turkey by means of an international commission composed of Ambassadors. I do not think that it was in our power to do more than we have done. We had no right to take a merely Greek or a merely Turkish view of the subject. We were bound to see fair play and to secure the observance of treaty obligations. We only gave such advice as seemed to conduce to the common interest of both parties. It is impossible in the present state of nations to form a plan for remote contingencies. No doubt the Turkish Empire is in a state of transition. The advice which is good now may not be good five or six years hence. But the House may rely on this—we shall watch carefully the changing circumstances of the time; we shall keep them and the public fully informed of these events as they pass; and I hope the House will believe that our sympathy for the Christian races of the East is not less real or sincere because we have not thought fit to give a semblance of encouragement to a hopeless insurrection or to compromise ourselves or them by a precipitate and premature action.

SUGAR DUTIES.

Resolutions [February 14] reported.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, on bringing up the Report, observed, that he had been misunderstood to state in the previous discussion on this subject that he was personally unfavourable to the classification of the duties on sugar, whereas he had, of course, always been personally favourable to that principle. What really happened was this: His hon. Friend the Member for Peter-of cruelty and barbarity which are said to have taken place. I am afraid there have been many of these on both sides. I am afraid this will always happen, where you have, in a country—which the hon. Member for Southwark has rightly described as semi-barbarous—wars of religion and of race. In such a country, and in quarrels of that nature, it is impossible that these acts of atrocity should not occur. Of such acts, I fear the blame must be pretty equally allotted to either side; but as to the extent to which they took place, it is not easy to judge. In the first place, one must not trust everything that one hears coming by native report from the interior of Crete. It must be borne in mind that the acts said to have been perpetrated have very seldom been witnessed by any one except the combatants themselves, who are not in a frame of mind to send impartial reports. I ought, in passing, to say that the truth of the most horrible story of all—that of women and children been allured to the shore by a Turkish vessel hoisting the English flag, and then fired upon—has been entirely denied on the part of the Turkish officers, and, for the credit of human nature, I hope it is not true. As to what has happened there, I do not know that it is much worse than what we unhappily know to be true—I mean that attack by the mob of the Piræus on their own volunteers, in which several lives were lost, and where there was no other provocation than that these unfortunate men had returned home unsuccessful. It is just also to say that whatever acts of cruelty may have been committed by the troops—and where irregular troops and Albanians have been employed these are almost sure to happen—there is not the slightest evidence to show that they have been in any case sanctioned, or even tolerated, by the Turkish Government. The prisoners who have fallen into the hands of the Turkish officers have been, as a rule, humanely and fairly treated. I do not know, after the very indulgent criticism which has been passed in this House on the policy of the Government, whether it is necessary for me to enter into any vindication of that policy. Some remarks have been made as to the decision to which the Government came when they were requested by several persons to send ships of war to take off the refugees. We never came to a decision with more regret. I myself never came to a decision with more personal pain; but never, also, with a clearer conviction that we were right, and were taking the only rational course which was open to us under the circumstances. It is simply impossible for any one who did not closely watch the insurrection, to understand the eagerness with which the slightest symptom of armed intervention on the part of the Western Powers was looked for by these insurgents, or the readiness with which any act which could be distorted into an act of intervention was caught up by them. I am quite sure that if we had given the assistance which was desired it would have been considered as a symptom of armed interference on the part of the European Powers; would have prolonged the hopeless struggle; and been in consequence the cause of ten times as much suffering as has been actually undergone. There is another point of view in which we were bound to consider this question. There are duties of neutrality, and though no one wishes to overstrain them where considerations of humanity come in, they nevertheless constitute an obligation which it is impossible to disregard. But to send troops in the rear of an insurrection for the purpose of taking away non-combatants or of assisting on the spot the families of those who are at that very time in arms, is giving aid and comfort to one of the belligerents. To my mind it is clear that that would be a breach of neutrality. It is certain that we should not have been allowed to take such a course in the case of a war between two strong European Powers, and I do not think there ought to be two rules, one for strong Powers, and one for weak ones. As regards the general question under discussion, there were only three alternatives which the Government could adopt. One was to carry out the principle of non-intervention in the strictest and most literal sense, by taking no notice at all of the whole matter. That alternative, however, I may at once dismiss from consideration. Another, which has sometimes been urged upon us, was, "Why, if you were giving any advice in the matter, did you not at once advise the cession of the island to Greece, and so put an end to the whole dispute." In answering that, I will not refer to the state of the Greek kingdom. I think that the truth as to the present state of Greece lies somewhere between the rose-coloured view of my hon. Friend behind me and the gloomy picture painted by the hon. Member for Southwark. It is impossible to say that the state of the Greek kingdom is at present satisfactory, but I do not think that alone is a reason which ought to have stood in the way of the annexation, had it been on other grounds expedient. The Greeks are a most intelligent and patriotic race. They have had to struggle against immense difficulties, and have had but a very limited time for exercising their unfettered energies. It is less than a quarter of a century since they became possessed of a Constitution. Under these circumstances, we ought to make every allowance for them, and ought not to bear too hardly upon them for what they may have done or left undone. But the reason which weighed with us against advising the annexation of Crete to the Greek kingdom was, first, the certainty that such advice would not be listened to. The Porte would not have been willing to listen for a moment to a suggestion that it should surrender any part of its dominions except under coercion, which is not the policy of this, or, as far as I know, of any other European country to employ. In the next place, if we gave advice professedly in the interest of Turkey we were bound in justice to look at the matter from a Turkish as well as from a Cretan point of view, and I think the Porte might fairly say that whether or not it would be an advantage to be rid of this one disaffected province, still the precedent would be almost fatal to the Empire; because if it came to be understood that in any province an insurrection were to be followed by a recommendation on the part of a European Power that the province should be ceded, that would be a premium on disaffection, and in process of time the Empire would be dismembered. What really happened was this: His hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey) had expressed a hope that the re-arrangement of duties was favourable to the British West Indies. He stated, in reply, that it was not; because, while the rates of duty on the two grades which comprised the bulk of imports from the West Indies either remained stationary or were raised, those on other qualities had been lowered. Consequently, speaking as a West India proprietor, he could have wished that the incidence of taxation had been somewhat different. But there was no ground of complaint; because the table was the result of the principle of which West Indians generally approved, and was in exact accordance with the provisions of the Convention of 1864.

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION.

(In the Committee.)*

MR. HUNT proposed the following Resolution:—

That, in lieu of the Duties of Assessed Taxes on Dogs, there shall be granted and charged in respect of Dogs kept in England after the 5th day of April, 1867, or kept in Scotland after the 24th day of May, 1867, the following Excise Duties, to be paid annually upon the taking out of the Excise Licences hereinafter mentioned (that is to say):

For and in respect of every Dog, of whatever description or denomination (except Hounds kept in a pack), for which a Licence to keep the same shall be taken out, the annual Duty of five shillings, to be paid by the person who shall keep such Dog;

For and in respect of Hounds kept in a pack, for which a Licence shall be taken out,—

Where the number shall not exceed twenty, the sum of five pounds;

Where the number shall exceed twenty, and shall not exceed thirty, the sum of seven pounds and ten shillings;

And where the number shall exceed thirty, then for every additional number of ten, and for any additional number less than ten, over and above thirty (or any other greater multiple than ten), the further additional Duty of two pounds and ten shillings;

To be paid by the owner or master of the said hounds.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know whether it was expected that under the alteration the duty would be more strictly levied, and that thereby the amount of the reduction would be made up?

MR. HUNT said, he did not anticipate any loss of revenue but rather an increase, for under the present system the owners of dogs made the returns, and many dogs were not put down in them. It was not proposed to adopt a system of ticketing or registering dogs. The owners of hounds would have the option of taking out a licence for each dog, or taking out a licence for a pack.

After a few words from Mr. READ,

Resolution agreed to; to be reported on Monday next.

EXECUTION OF DEEDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GOLDNEY, Bill to simplify and lessen the expense of the Execution of Deeds by Married Women, and to amend the Law as regards the effect of Deeds executed under Powers of Attorney, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GOLDNEY, Mr. LEEHAN, and Mr. POWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 26.]

SPIRITUAL DESTITUTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, for the purpose of making better provision for Spiritual Destitution, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. BERRFORD HOPE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 27.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, till Monday next.

Monday, February 18, 1867.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), The Marquess of Westmeath, The Earl of Airlie, and The Earl Stanhope added.

PRIVILEGE.—PAMPHLET OF MR. R. S. FRANCE.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had hoped, after what he had stated to their Lordships on a previous occasion, that it would not be necessary for him to ask the House to take any steps in reference to Mr. France, who had made incorrect statements with respect to the course taken by him, as Chairman of Committees, when dealing with a certain Bill. As, however, Mr. France would not add to the correspondence which had taken place between them a letter explaining that he had been mistaken in what he had said as to particular clauses in the Bill, he now moved that Mr.

France be required to attend at the Bar to-morrow, and to bring with him the correspondence on the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE suggested that the correspondence between the noble Lord and Mr. France ought to be placed in their Lordships' hands before they were called upon to send the latter gentleman to prison.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had not moved to commit Mr. France to prison, but only that he be directed to attend at the Bar. He hoped that, in answer to one or two questions which he should put to him, Mr. France would give the explanation which, as Chairman of Committees, he thought he was entitled to expect.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered that Mr. R. S. France do attend at the Bar of this House To-morrow, at Five o'Clock, and bring with him the Letters addressed to him by The Lord Redesdale on the Subject of a Pamphlet written by him entitled "Lord Redesdale and the new Railways."

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) ACT.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ESSEX said, he wished to ask the noble Earl at the head of the Government a Question—namely, Whether, considering the state in which Ireland now was—considering that Fenianism was only scotched, not killed—knowing that the very day after the affair at Chester a large number of men were arrested in Dublin immediately after their arrival from England, having, it was supposed, returned to Ireland in the belief that the law under which the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended had expired—he wished to ask whether, under all these circumstances, and considering what had since taken place in other parts of Ireland, it was still the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act should cease at the end of the present month? He would take this opportunity of expressing a strong hope—even at the risk of offending the delicate susceptibilities of the Exeter Hall people—that if any of those unfortunate Fenians fell into the hands of the Government—being captured as it were red-handed—they would be treated with the utmost rigour of the law as being guilty of high treason. He hoped that no humanitarians, so common in our days—excellent men no doubt in other respects—would be allowed to stand between those people and the punishment which they so richly deserved. He would further express a strong hope that if on those occasions the military should be called upon to act, and that blood should be shed, they would not be exposed to the risk of criminal proceedings for acting vigorously in defence of their Queen and country. He could conceive nothing more discouraging to both officers and soldiers than that when called out to act in defence of law and order against a body of rebels, they should feel that they might perhaps be exposed to a criminal prosecution if lives were lost through their vigour and promptitude in suppressing a revolt. He could conceive nothing more humiliating than the position in which the officers of the British army were sometimes placed in cases of great danger and emergency. If they hesitated to do their duty, probably they would be professionally disgraced. On the other hand, if they acted vigorously and resolutely, they ran the risk of indictment in a criminal court. He believed that the extraordinary leniency shown to State criminals since the period of Mr. Smith O'Brien's affair for crimes which were formerly characterized by the old-fashioned names of rebellion and high treason, and punished as such, had acted in effect as a premium for the encouragement of similar crimes. It was well to say that prevention was better than cure. The Government had tried that principle, and had it succeeded? It had tried leniency—had it succeeded? Witness the return of the Fenians from other countries to which they had been allowed to remove themselves, to their own country, for the purpose of renewing their rebellious machinations. What did they care for the consequences when they believed that if captured they would be only condemned to a few months' imprisonment, or at the utmost to a few years' penal servitude? What did they care, if even the military were called out, if they believed that they would not be allowed to act with energy or vigour against them? He should be sorry to be supposed harsh or unfeeling; but he believed that this principle of leniency had been carried too far, and he believed that if the Government wished to put a stop to such wicked proceedings as those to which he had referred, it could only do so effectually by dealing with the leaders in the most summary manner possible, and by teaching their misguided followers that they could not raise the flag of rebellion and disturb the peace of the country without incurring

the penalty which the law attached to such a serious crime. The noble Earl concluded by again asking whether it was the intention of the Government to persevere in their expressed intention to allow the Act for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland to expire?

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that before the noble Earl at the head of the Government answered the Question, he wished to make a few observations. He positively denied that all this mischief had commenced in Ireland. He believed that it was concocted in Manchester and other large towns in England. He was informed, and believed his information to be correct, that a Member of the House of Commons connected with Ireland, who had distinguished himself at some of the Reform meetings in this country, had been telegraphing brief reports of these proceedings to his friends in Ireland. He must protest against the whole blame being thrown on the Irish population—they were all Reform demonstrations, in fact. They had first the Hyde Park riots, then the Chester affair, and lastly the Killarney demonstration, and they were all organized to demand "Reform" of some kind or other. He should like to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had any intention of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Chester? Noble Lords on the other side of the House must see that outbreaks such as had taken place in Kerry were very much what was to be expected from their own policy.

THE EARL OF DERBY: With regard to the Question put by the noble Earl who has just sat down, I have to say that the Government has decidedly no intention of proposing to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Chester. With regard to the other Question put to me, I regret to say that I heard the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Essex) very imperfectly; but, as far as I understood him, he inquired as to whether the Government intends moving for a continuance of the Act suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland; and, at the same time, the noble Earl expressed a hope that if any of the Fenians connected with the recent disturbances were captured, the utmost rigour of the law would be administered to them; and, also, that military officers would be protected by the Government from any criminal proceedings which might be brought against them in consequence of any acts committed by them in the discharge of their duty. The question is one of such great importance that I think it would have been better if the noble Earl had given me notice of his intention to put it. At the same time, I can quite understand that, as the Act of suspension has so nearly run out its term, your Lordships are all anxious for some information as to the Government's intention with reference to the matter. But I regret I cannot yet give a positive answer to the noble Earl. Your Lordships know that in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne a hope was expressed that the Government would be able to dispense with any exceptional legislation on this subject with regard to Ireland. It must, however, be borne in mind that the recent outbreak, insignificant as it was, was perfectly unexpected and unforeseen by any party. I am happy, however, to say that, from the accounts we have received, the affair has been entirely put down, and that the result has to a great extent refuted the anticipations of the late Lord Lieutenant, who feared that any rising in the country would at once be joined by a large portion of the population. As a matter of fact, the rioters have been joined by no one; they were insignificant in point of number, utterly deserted by everybody, and exercised not the slightest influence on the surrounding population. It is impossible to say at present whether similar insane attempts to theirs may not be made in other parts of Ireland; and I think it better to postpone the consideration of the subject until the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who has returned from Dublin, and who will, of course, be able to furnish the latest information, has been conferred with. As to the prisoners who may be taken, I can assure the noble Earl that the Government will endeavour wisely to discriminate as to the relative guilt of each prisoner; and while, with regard to the highest description of offenders, they will not shrink from enforcing the utmost rigour of the law, yet every case will be judged on its own merits. I am sure, however, that it is not your Lordships' wish that the less guilty should be visited with undue severity. As to the hope expressed by the noble Earl with reference to the officers now in Ireland, I trust it is not necessary to say that, in the discharge of the painful duties which may devolve upon them in suppressing these disturbances, they may rely upon the fullest support from Her Majesty's Government,

THE IRISH LINES.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked, When the Report of the Royal Commission on Railways would be presented; and whether the Government had yet considered the applications for Government interference in the concerns of Irish Railways? He apologized for having introduced the Question at such an early period of the Session, but thought himself justified by the pressing importance of the subject; for in his opinion the most effectual way to improve the condition of Ireland was to aid the development of her material resources.

THE EARL OF DERBY: It is quite true that the Question referred to by the noble Marquess is one of very great importance to Ireland: and the Government have received a great many memorials praying that the subject should be taken up. It is quite true, also, that the evidence taken before the Commissioners has been before the public for some time; but the Commissioners have not yet made their Report, and it may be three weeks or a month before they are able to do so. Until the Report has been presented the Government cannot, of course, come to a conclusion upon the subject. The question is not only of the greatest importance, but also, as the noble Marquess should know, of the greatest difficulty. There can be no question that the railways of Ireland can be more economically managed, and that the great expense to which the different companies are put, solely in consequence of their number, would be very largely decreased if the proprietary were consolidated under one head, with one management. This would not only decrease expense, but probably tend to an increase of productiveness. But, at the same time, we must remember that railway property in Ireland is not in the most prosperous condition; out of the 1,800 miles of railway in the country, only six miles—the line from Dublin to Kingstown—pay a really satisfactory dividend. I am afraid to say how many companies are absolutely bankrupt, or how many have suspended operations altogether. But I must say that Her Majesty's Government are asked to undertake a very grave task when they are invited to undertake the management of such a property as the Irish railways, putting aside pecuniary considerations. I do not understand that the railway companies are at all agreed as to the course they would desire us to pursue, except that they would like us to buy all their railways at their own price—especially those lines which pay no dividend at all; but that would not be a very profitable speculation for the Government to enter upon. Then there are many objections to the proposal that the Government should undertake the management of railway property; there are political reasons, such as the enormous patronage which would in that case be vested in the hands of Ministers. But supposing the Government did buy the railways, a question arises which is not easily answered. We are told that it would be infinitely to the advantage of the country if the railway fares were lowered; and all the railway directors say that lowering the fares would be to the advantage of the companies; but they also agree in saying that the shareholders object to lower the fares because, whatever the ultimate result, the immediate consequence would be a considerable loss. Accordingly, a few of the Irish railway companies desire the Government to bear that loss, though they think it very undesirable the shareholders should do so. On the whole, much difference of opinion prevails upon this question, which demands most serious consideration; and at present I can only promise that, as soon as the Commissioners have furnished us with their Report, we will give our best attention to their recommendations—we will consider how far their recommendations are borne out by the information brought before them and shape our course accordingly.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The Act of 1844 fixes the amount to be paid by the Government as twenty-five years' purchase of the net receipts. But suppose a railway has received nothing, how much will twenty-years' purchase of that amount to?

ALIMONY ARREARS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to facilitate the Recovery of Arrears of Alimony in certain Cases under Decrees and Orders of the Provincial and Diocesan Courts in Ireland—Was presented by The Viscount LIFFORD; read 1st. (No. 17.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

Powers were prepared to intervene—and modern policy did not run greatly in favour of intervention—it was only doing those unhappy Christians an incalculable mischief to encourage them in these hopeless rebellions. He believed there was a future in store for the Christian population of Turkey. They were rapidly improving in wealth and intelligence; and this fact, which had been generally admitted, and indeed urged in their favour in this debate, did not agree with the terrible accounts of Turkish oppression and misrule which were given by his hon. Friend. If the English ladies, to whom his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had referred, could only relate the idle stories that were told to every traveller in Turkey, they might as well have staid at home. He had heard similar stories over and over again. If life and property were so insecure as they described them to be, was it possible for the Christian population to go on improving in wealth and intelligence? The Turks were now under the influence of the public opinion of Europe. Since he first knew Turkey an incalculable improvement had taken place. Some years ago Christians were not allowed to ride on horses in certain towns in Turkey, and were compelled to wear certain dresses. Those restrictions, and nearly all others which made a distinction between the two creeds, were now done away with, and the two races were beginning to find that it was for the advantage of each that the rights and property of the other should be respected. Events were rapidly bringing the two races together, and the only danger was lest animosities and mutual hatred between them should be kindled by Motions of this kind, and by injudicious or ambitious foreign interference. He felt certain a time would come when some method would be found by these populations themselves for coming to a better understanding. The Turks would see it to be to their advantage to concede to the Christians the rights they ought to possess, and the Christians on their part would find that the Turks also had their just rights. Thus mutual concessions would be made, and a form of government might be ultimately devised in which all sects would be fairly represented, and the rights and privileges of all be respected without great and manifest injustice being done to either Turks or Christians.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he

agreed with much that had fallen from his hon. Friend opposite; but with regard to the future, he had entirely failed to shadow forth any solution of the question. He believed that under certain conditions and stipulations there were countries under Turkish dominion more fortunate than those under certain other Powers, with higher pretensions to civilization. The course which he recommended last year in the case of the Danubian Principalities had since been carried out, and those countries had been entirely liberated from the intervention of Turkey. The negotiations had resulted in the abandonment of the quasi-rights of the Sultan, and in the acceptance of Prince Charles of Hohenzollern as Hospodar of Wallachia on almost his own terms. The only interest that England had in the matter was that the populations of the East should live harmoniously together, and England was the only European Power which had no interest in the acquisition of any fresh territory. He thought the prudence displayed by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord Stanley) was the best quality to be exercised in a case of this kind, though it was different to the adventurous policy which they had formerly been accustomed to at the Foreign Office, and which they at one time used to hold in high estimation. He thought the way in which Moldavia and Wallachia had been dealt with ought to be the manner in which the Turks should deal with Serbia. Every one knew that after a long and gallant struggle Serbia had gained substantial independence, and that the last remnant of Turkish rule consisted in the possession of the fortresses along the line of the Danube. These fortresses were perfectly useless to the Turkish authorities. They consisted for the most part of dilapidated battlements, which could be commanded from every surrounding hill. The only one which was of any military value was that of Belgrade; but he believed the main reason that induced the Turks to maintain it was one of a sentimental character, because it was said to be one of the old historical fortresses of Turkey. But it had belonged to Austria as well as to Turkey, having in fact been taken and re-taken many times within the last 400 years, till at last by treaty provision it was made a Turkish fortress. The city of Belgrade, the capital of the province, was placed in the position of a mere suburb of the castle, and the palace of the Prince was within three-quarters of a mile from the fortress, and therefore within reach of its guns, which the bombardment of 1862 had so fully demonstrated. The occupation, therefore, of that fortress by the Turks was a standing insult as well as a menace to the Servians, and it was impossible that the city could flourish while it and its inhabitants were liable to be annihilated at any moment that the Turkish employés chose to bombard them. In the interest of the Porte herself it was desirable that she should give up these fortresses, which cost her some £200,000 a year, while the entire tribute she obtained from Serbia was only £20,000. At this moment he was afraid that the demands of Serbia were on the point of reaching their climax, and that they would no longer remain in their present state of humiliation. There would be an outbreak ere long in that country, if the grievance he was referring to was not redressed—which would be very likely to extend into other districts. He hoped, therefore, the noble Lord would take the example of the proceedings with regard to the Danubian Provinces, and urge on the Porte to follow that example in regard to Serbia, by yielding to the strongly-expressed wishes of the population and withdrawing from the fortresses. He recommended these considerations to the noble Lord, and he left the case with great confidence in his hands. He knew the calm and clear reason which operated in his mind; and though, as he had said, these were not the qualities which they had been accustomed to see in the Foreign Office, yet they were not the less valuable on that account.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I should be very sorry if, with regard to Turkey, we were not to treat her with the respect that is due to an independent Power responsible for the government of an extended territory. At the same time, with reference to many of her provinces, and even her general concerns, circumstances have at various times placed her in such a position that we are entitled, and indeed in many cases bound, to entertain questions affecting her internal relations to her people such as it would be impertinence to entertain in respect to most other foreign countries. With so much of apology, I must say I cannot help being of opinion that there is great good sense and justice in most of what has fallen from the hon. Member in regard to the case of Serbia. We cannot expect Turkey to conform her notions to ours. All we can expect is that where she has contracted

either legal or moral engagements she should fulfil them, and that where she is under no such engagement she should lend a willing ear to counsels in themselves judicious, and which aim solely at the promotion of her interests. When we reduce the question of the retention of the fortresses of Serbia by Turkey to this issue, the sole issue—how far such retention can serve the interests of the Ottoman Government—it appears to me impossible that that question can receive any answer but one in the negative. I am not aware of any purpose of utility, whether for peace at home or for defence against foreign Powers, which Turkey can accomplish by military possession of Serbia; while, unquestionably, the monetary burden which it imposes on her adds to the inconvenience of her financial condition, always difficult. At the same time, such possession keeps up a painful feeling of irritation between the people of Serbia and those of Turkey, which is a constant source of danger. I cannot, therefore, but subscribe to the opinion of the hon. Member, and hope that at the present or some other time, an opportunity will be taken of tendering some friendly counsel on the subject from this country to the Ottoman Porte. But a great part of the interesting discussion of this evening has been devoted to a point which at this time will enlist more of the sympathy of the House—namely, that connected with the—I do not know whether I should say recent, or still existing disturbances in Crete. I am hardly able to subscribe to the proposition we have heard to-night that the grievances of the island of Candia have had nothing to do with the production of those disturbances. I expressed a hope on a former occasion that when Her Majesty's Government laid the papers on the table, those papers would show that the Ottoman Government had fulfilled its engagements—I do not mean written engagements only, but moral, substantial engagements to Europe about the existence of which there can be no doubt. If there has been a prompt and faithful performance of the stipulations of what is known as the Hatti-Humayoun of 1856, I am not able—after reading those papers—to affirm that they show it. This book does not contain evidence to that effect; but if the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), with his more extended and accurate knowledge, is able in his place to say that Turkey has completely and fully accomplished the engagements she entered into, I would receive that assurance with great satisfaction and willingly bow to the opinion issuing from such a source. For upon that question depends another—namely, whether the responsibility of those disturbances of Crete, and of the barbarity, the cruelty, and devastation which have taken place there, lies at the door of those immediately concerned in the outbreak or of the Government under which they live. I do not think after the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) it can rightly be said that the rights and claims of the Turkish Government are inadequately or inefficiently or even only sufficiently represented in this House. I must say that the case of Turkey against Crete has been stated by my hon. Friend much better than it is stated in the document itself contained in this blue book. But it is fair to admit, and I should not hesitate to admit, that, in addition to any grievance that might have arisen from the non-performance of the Hatti-Humayoun, there has been the deeper grievance resulting from the strong Hellenic feeling which pervades the population. Some at least of the population would be disposed to avail themselves of every opportunity to give effect to that sentiment of nationality. I also agree with what has been stated with great force by my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Galway, as to the extreme responsibility incurred by those who in this House deliver statements which, going forth, perhaps, in a garbled form to other countries, may be the means of fomenting disturbances or of prolonging efforts which, whether they be right or whether they be wrong in themselves tend in the actual condition of things to expose to greater dangers those by whom they are undertaken. In such a question as that of the liberation of Greece, the statesmen of England would have made themselves deeply responsible if they had encouraged the people of that country in their struggle for freedom. I would not venture to say one word which would have the effect of encouraging the people of Crete to throw off the Ottoman rule. But as far as regards the stipulations of the Hatti-Humayoun, we are not only entitled from our position to advise Turkey in her own interests, in her regard to humanity, in her sense of justice, in her desire to be a civilized European Power, to fulfil those engagements; but we are also entitled to say to her that her fulfilment of those stipulations is a matter of moral faith, an obligation to which she is absolutely bound, and the disregard of which will entail upon her disgrace in the eyes of Europe. I am happy to observe that, as far as I can gather from the papers before us, the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord Stanley) has exhibited much discretion and forbearance in this matter. I agree in the opinion that he rightly determined to observe and to enforce the laws of neutrality, even though at the expense of the calls of mere humanity. The calls of mere humanity it was his duty to repress, and he has repressed them. It was right and wise to say that he would not encourage the separation of Candia from the Ottoman Empire; and it was also right and wise to point out to the Ottoman Porte, as he has done, especially in his despatch of the 17th of January of this present year, that the true policy of the Ottoman Empire, its only policy—the only possible course which it could take in relation to the Powers of Europe, with peace and satisfaction to others as well as to itself—was to do full justice to the principles of the Hatti-Humayoun, and to allow the Christians under their rule to feel that, though nominally under the sway of a Mussulman Power, they enjoyed all the advantages of a Christian Government. I cannot but hope that, within the last year, we have seen a step in advance, in that policy adopted not at the first moment, but after a brief delay—which it is not for us to complain of—in the case of the Danubian Principalities. The literal application of it may be impossible; but I hope that the principle acted upon in that instance may be adopted throughout the European provinces of the Ottoman Porte. My hon. Friend the Member for Southwark has pointed out, and the noble Lord points out, the difficulty in the case of Candia, which arises from the presence of a Mahomedan population, which, though numerically small as compared with the Christian population, is in possession of domination and ascendancy from ancient times, and is in a more powerful position in consequence of the property and rank which belong to its members. I do not, therefore, pretend to say that the same arrangements as those which have been adopted elsewhere are applicable to Crete; but we are entitled to require from Turkey the execution of her literal engagements, and we are entitled to recommend to her such a policy as the noble Lord has put before her in his despatches. I trust that what has been done by Turkey in the Danubian Principalities may promise for the future the existence of such relations between that country and her provinces as will conduce in the highest degree to the interest of both parties.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I do not feel it my duty to take part in that animated controversy respecting the comparative merits of the Turkish and the Christian races which has been carried on with so much ability on both sides of the House, and with a knowledge of local details probably unrivalled in this country, by the hon. Member for Southwark. Neither shall I go into the question of the foreign policy on Eastern matters, pursued by England in former times. Every age and every generation has its own policy—one suited to its ideas and its wants. My business is not to question what was done in former times, but simply to explain, and if necessary—I am happy to say from the course of the debate that on this occasion it does not seem to be necessary—to vindicate the course which the present Government have taken. Two questions have been raised—one relating to Crete, the other to Serbia. As to Serbia the explanation will be brief, but I trust satisfactory. We have, after much deliberation and in concert with other Powers, advised the Porte to make such concessions as appear to us to be necessary to meet the natural and reasonable wishes of the Servians. We hope that those concessions will bring about a good understanding, and we have recommended them with all sincerity in the interest of the Turkish Empire, because it is impossible to doubt that a serious outbreak in Serbia at the present time would be one of the greatest misfortunes that could occur to Turkey. We have endeavoured to offer that advice in such a manner as to leave with the Porte itself, to whom it more properly belongs, the initiative of making those concessions which we consider necessary; because it is obvious that they would lose much of their grace and value if they were made, or seemed to be made, at the dictation of any foreign Power. I am not able at present to say more than that the representations which we have thought it our duty to address to the Porte have been made in a spirit of moderation—in a spirit which is fair, friendly, and conciliatory. I hope, therefore, that these representations will not be wholly ineffective. At the same time, no positive answer

has been received, and I think the House will agree with me that while correspondence is still being carried on, and while negotiations are pending, it would not conduce to the object which we all have in view if the papers asked for by the hon. Gentleman were laid upon the table. When the matter is settled I will produce them. With regard to the perhaps larger, certainly more urgent, question of Crete, it is even less necessary that I should explain in detail the views of the Government; because those views have been stated very fully upon many occasions in the papers which I presented a few days ago. I have been asked by several speakers what we consider to be the real origin of the insurrection. A more difficult question it is impossible to put or to answer. It is very hard to get at the truth in any of these matters. Impartial witnesses are few, and, as a general rule, statements received from the two sides are not merely divergent and conflicting, but absolutely and flatly contradictory. I do not for a moment doubt that local grievances have to some extent existed, and I do not doubt that the administration of Candia has not been what we should consider a good one in a civilized country accustomed to regular Government. But what is the precise magnitude of the grievances of which the island may have had to complain is a question which I am utterly unable to answer. However, whether local grievances have had any part in causing this insurrection or not—in my opinion they have had some part—I am clear that they have not been the sole causes. There is another explanation which more readily occurs. I think it has been from the first—or at least from the moment when it began to be serious—a movement, not for the redress of any local abuses, but a movement of a religious and a national character in favour of entire separation from the Turkish Government. Nor is it unnatural that a feeling of that kind should have existed. These Hellenes—for, no doubt, the centre of the movement was in Greece, though the disturbances broke out beyond the limits of that country—had observed the great success attending other movements in favour of nationalities. They had seen Italy made a nation, and Germany to a great extent united, and I do not think it unnatural that they should believe that their time had come. The movements they had witnessed in other countries re-acted upon them. Then I have been asked questions as to acts of cruelty and barbarity which are said to have taken place. I am afraid there have been many of these on both sides. I am afraid this will always happen, where you have, in a country—which the hon. Member for Southwark has rightly described as semi-barbarous—wars of religion and of race. In such a country, and in quarrels of that nature, it is impossible that these acts of atrocity should not occur. Of such acts, I fear the blame must be pretty equally allotted to either side; but as to the extent to which they took place, it is not easy to judge. In the first place, one must not trust everything that one hears coming by native report from the interior of Crete. It must be borne in mind that the acts said to have been perpetrated have very seldom been witnessed by any one except the combatants themselves, who are not in a frame of mind to send impartial reports. I ought, in passing, to say that the truth of the most horrible story of all—that of women and children been allured to the shore by a Turkish vessel hoisting the English flag, and then fired upon—has been entirely denied on the part of the Turkish officers, and, for the credit of human nature, I hope it is not true. As to what has happened there, I do not know that it is much worse than what we unhappily know to be true—I mean that attack by the mob of the Piræus on their own volunteers, in which several lives were lost, and where there was no other provocation than that these unfortunate men had returned home unsuccessful. It is just also to say that whatever acts of cruelty may have been committed by the troops—and where irregular troops and Albanians have been employed these are almost sure to happen—there is not the slightest evidence to show that they have been in any case sanctioned, or even tolerated, by the Turkish Government. The prisoners who have fallen into the hands of the Turkish officers have been, as a rule, humanely and fairly treated. I do not know, after the very indulgent criticism which has been passed in this House on the policy of the Government, whether it is necessary for me to enter into any vindication of that policy. Some remarks have been made as to the decision to which the Government came when they were requested by several persons to send ships of war to take off the refugees. We never came to a decision with more regret. I myself never came to a decision with more personal pain; but never, also, with a clearer conviction that we were right, and were taking the only rational course which was open to us under the circumstances. It is simply impossible for any one who did not closely watch the insurrection, to understand the eagerness with which the slightest symptom of armed intervention on the part of the Western Powers was looked for by these insurgents, or the readiness with which any act which could be distorted into an act of intervention was caught up by them. I am quite sure that if we had given the assistance which was desired it would have been considered as a symptom of armed interference on the part of the European Powers; would have prolonged the hopeless struggle; and been in consequence the cause of ten times as much suffering as has been actually undergone. There is another point of view in which we were bound to consider this question. There are duties of neutrality, and though no one wishes to overstrain them where considerations of humanity come in, they nevertheless constitute an obligation which it is impossible to disregard. But to send troops in the rear of an insurrection for the purpose of taking away non-combatants or of assisting on the spot the families of those who are at that very time in arms, is giving aid and comfort to one of the belligerents. To my mind it is clear that that would be a breach of neutrality. It is certain that we should not have been allowed to take such a course in the case of a war between two strong European Powers, and I do not think there ought to be two rules, one for strong Powers, and one for weak ones. As regards the general question under discussion, there were only three alternatives which the Government could adopt. One was to carry out the principle of non-intervention in the strictest and most literal sense, by taking no notice at all of the whole matter. That alternative, however, I may at once dismiss from consideration. Another, which has sometimes been urged upon us, was, "Why, if you were giving any advice in the matter, did you not at once advise the cession of the island to Greece, and so put an end to the whole dispute." In answering that, I will not refer to the state of the Greek kingdom. I think that the truth as to the present state of Greece lies somewhere between the rose-coloured view of my hon. Friend behind me and the gloomy picture painted by the hon. Member for Southwark. It is impossible to say that the state of the Greek kingdom is at present satisfactory, but I do not think that alone is a reason which ought to have stood in the way of the annexation, had it been on other grounds expedient. The Greeks are a most intelligent and patriotic race. They have had to struggle against immense difficulties, and have had but a very limited time for exercising their unfettered energies. It is less than a quarter of a century since they became possessed of a Constitution. Under these circumstances, we ought to make every allowance for them, and ought not to bear too hardly upon them for what they may have done or left undone. But the reason which weighed with us against advising the annexation of Crete to the Greek kingdom was, first, the certainty that such advice would not be listened to. The Porte would not have been willing to listen for a moment to a suggestion that it should surrender any part of its dominions except under coercion, which is not the policy of this, or, as far as I know, of any other European country to employ. In the next place, if we gave advice professedly in the interest of Turkey we were bound in justice to look at the matter from a Turkish as well as from a Cretan point of view, and I think the Porte might fairly say that whether or not it would be an advantage to be rid of this one disaffected province, still the precedent would be almost fatal to the Empire; because if it came to be understood that in any province an insurrection were to be followed by a recommendation on the part of a European Power that the province should be ceded, that would be a premium on disaffection, and in process of time the Empire would be dismembered. Then I come to the third course, and pass on to the friendly criticism of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). The right hon. Gentleman rather hinted than said that we might have pressed our advice a little more strongly on the Porte, and he reminded me of the rights which, by the Treaty of 1856, the Christian subjects of the Porte possessed. I do not deny those treaty obligations. I assent to the doctrine laid down in respect to them; but we must remember that a demand for a separate administration for Crete was far more than could be claimed by any treaty rights, which relate to the toleration of Christians in matters of religion and their admission to give evidence on equal terms with other persons in courts of justice.

So much we should have been entitled to demand for them; anything more could only be the subject of request and advice. In matters of this sort there is a double danger to be avoided. If it be thought that you give advice merely to satisfy your own conscience, and that you do not care about the matter, then your advice will lose much of its effect. If, on the other hand, you pressed your advice strongly, then the Porte might turn round and say that they yielded because they could not help themselves, declaring at the same time that you, and not they, were responsible for the consequences. And then you come to the most hopeless and impossible of all political devices—the attempt to govern a great Empire like Turkey by means of an international commission composed of Ambassadors. I do not think that it was in our power to do more than we have done. We had no right to take a merely Greek or a merely Turkish view of the subject. We were bound to see fair play and to secure the observance of treaty obligations. We only gave such advice as seemed to conduce to the common interest of both parties. It is impossible in the present state of nations to form a plan for remote contingencies. No doubt the Turkish Empire is in a state of transition. The advice which is good now may not be good five or six years hence. But the House may rely on this—we shall watch carefully the changing circumstances of the time; we shall keep them and the public fully informed of these events as they pass; and I hope the House will believe that our sympathy for the Christian races of the East is not less real or sincere because we have not thought fit to give a semblance of encouragement to a hopeless insurrection or to compromise ourselves or them by a precipitate and premature action.

SUGAR DUTIES.

Resolutions [February 14] reported.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, on bringing up the Report, observed, that he had been misunderstood to state in the previous discussion on this subject that he was personally unfavourable to the classification of the duties on sugar, whereas he had, of course, always been personally favourable to that principle. What really happened was this: His hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey) had expressed a hope that the re-arrangement of duties was favourable to the British West Indies. He stated, in reply, that it was not; because, while the rates of duty on the two grades which comprised the bulk of imports from the West Indies either remained stationary or were raised, those on other qualities had been lowered. Consequently, speaking as a West India proprietor, he could have wished that the incidence of taxation had been somewhat different. But there was no ground of complaint; because the table was the result of the principle of which West Indians generally approved, and was in exact accordance with the provisions of the Convention of 1864.

DUTY ON DOGS.

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION.

(In the Committee.)*

MR. HUNT proposed the following Resolution:—

That, in lieu of the Duties of Assessed Taxes on Dogs, there shall be granted and charged in respect of Dogs kept in England after the 5th day of April, 1867, or kept in Scotland after the 24th day of May, 1867, the following Excise Duties, to be paid annually upon the taking out of the Excise Licences hereinafter mentioned (that is to say):

For and in respect of every Dog, of whatever description or denomination (except Hounds kept in a pack), for which a Licence to keep the same shall be taken out, the annual Duty of five shillings, to be paid by the person who shall keep such Dog;

For and in respect of Hounds kept in a pack, for which a Licence shall be taken out,—

Where the number shall not exceed twenty, the sum of five pounds;

Where the number shall exceed twenty, and shall not exceed thirty, the sum of seven pounds and ten shillings;

And where the number shall exceed thirty, then for every additional number of ten, and for any additional number less than ten, over and above thirty (or any other greater multiple than ten), the further additional Duty of two pounds and ten shillings;

To be paid by the owner or master of the said hounds.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know whether it was expected that under the alteration the duty would be more strictly levied, and that thereby the amount of the reduction would be made up?

MR. HUNT said, he did not anticipate any loss of revenue but rather an increase, for under the present system the owners of dogs made the returns, and many dogs were not put down in them. It was not proposed to adopt a system of ticketing or registering dogs. The owners of hounds would have the option of taking out a licence for each dog, or taking out a licence for a pack.

After a few words from MR. READ,

Resolution agreed to; to be reported on Monday next.

EXECUTION OF DEEDS BILL.

On Motion of MR. GOLDNEY, Bill to simplify and lessen the expense of the Execution of Deeds by Married Women, and to amend the Law as regards the effect of Deeds executed under Powers of Attorney, ordered to be brought in by MR. GOLDNEY, MR. LEEHMAN, and MR. POWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 26.]

SPIRITUAL DESTITUTION BILL.

On Motion of MR. AYRTON, Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, for the purpose of making better provision for Spiritual Destitution, ordered to be brought in by MR. AYRTON and MR. BARNESFORD HORN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 27.]

House adjourned at a quarter before
Nine o'clock, till Monday next.

Monday, February 18, 1867.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE.—On Traffic Regulation (Metropolis). The Marquess of Westmeath, The Earl of Airlie, and The Earl Stanhope added.

PRIVILEGE.—PAMPHLET OF MR. R. S. FRANCE.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had hoped, after what he had stated to their Lordships on a previous occasion, that it would not be necessary for him to ask the House to take any steps in reference to Mr. France, who had made incorrect statements with respect to the course taken by him, as Chairman of Committees, when dealing with a certain Bill. As, however, Mr. France would not add to the correspondence which had taken place between them a letter explaining that he had been mistaken in what he had said as to particular clauses in the Bill, he now moved that Mr.

France be required to attend at the Bar to-morrow, and to bring with him the correspondence on the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE suggested that the correspondence between the noble Lord and Mr. France ought to be placed in their Lordships' hands before they were called upon to send the latter gentleman to prison.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had not moved to commit Mr. France to prison, but only that he be directed to attend at the Bar. He hoped that, in answer to one or two questions which he should put to him, Mr. France would give the explanation which, as Chairman of Committees, he thought he was entitled to expect.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered that Mr. R. S. France do attend at the Bar of this House To-morrow, at Five o'Clock, and bring with him the Letters addressed to him by The Lord Redesdale on the Subject of a Pamphlet written by him entitled "Lord Redesdale and the new Railways."

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) ACT.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ESSEX said, he wished to ask the noble Earl at the head of the Government a Question—namely, Whether, considering the state in which Ireland now was—considering that Fenianism was only scotched, not killed—knowing that the very day after the affair at Chester a large number of men were arrested in Dublin immediately after their arrival from England, having, it was supposed, returned to Ireland in the belief that the law under which the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended had expired—he wished to ask whether, under all these circumstances, and considering what had since taken place in other parts of Ireland, it was still the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act should cease at the end of the present month? He would take this opportunity of expressing a strong hope—even at the risk of offending the delicate susceptibilities of the Exeter Hall people—that if any of those unfortunate Fenians fell into the hands of the Government—being captured as it were red-handed—they would be treated with the utmost rigour of the law as being guilty of high treason. He hoped that no humanitarians, so common in our days—excellent men no doubt in other respects—would be allowed to stand between those people and the punishment which they so richly deserved. He would further express a strong hope that if on those occasions the military should be called upon to act, and that blood should be shed, they would not be exposed to the risk of criminal proceedings for acting vigorously in defence of their Queen and country. He could conceive nothing more discouraging to both officers and soldiers than that when called out to act in defence of law and order against a body of rebels, they should feel that they might perhaps be exposed to a criminal prosecution if lives were lost through their vigour and promptitude in suppressing a revolt. He could conceive nothing more humiliating than the position in which the officers of the British army were sometimes placed in cases of great danger and emergency. If they hesitated to do their duty, probably they would be professionally disgraced. On the other hand, if they acted vigorously and resolutely, they ran the risk of indictment in a criminal court. He believed that the extraordinary leniency shown to State criminals since the period of Mr. Smith O'Brien's affair for crimes which were formerly characterized by the old-fashioned names of rebellion and high treason, and punished as such, had acted in effect as a premium for the encouragement of similar crimes. It was well to say that prevention was better than cure. The Government had tried that principle, and had it succeeded? It had tried leniency—had it succeeded? Witness the return of the Fenians from other countries to which they had been allowed to remove themselves, to their own country, for the purpose of renewing their rebellious machinations. What did they care for the consequences when they believed that if captured they would be only condemned to a few months' imprisonment, or at the utmost to a few years' penal servitude? What did they care, if even the military were called out, if they believed that they would not be allowed to act with energy or vigour against them? He should be sorry to be supposed harsh or unfeeling; but he believed that this principle of leniency had been carried too far, and he believed that if the Government wished to put a stop to such wicked proceedings as those to which he had referred, it could only do so effectually by dealing with the leaders in the most summary manner possible, and by teaching their misguided followers that they could not raise the flag of rebellion and disturb the peace of the country without incurring

the penalty which the law attached to such a serious crime. The noble Earl concluded by again asking whether it was the intention of the Government to persevere in their expressed intention to allow the Act for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland to expire?

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that before the noble Earl at the head of the Government answered the Question, he wished to make a few observations. He positively denied that all this mischief had commenced in Ireland. He believed that it was concocted in Manchester and other large towns in England. He was informed, and believed his information to be correct, that a Member of the House of Commons connected with Ireland, who had distinguished himself at some of the Reform meetings in this country, had been telegraphing brief reports of these proceedings to his friends in Ireland. He must protest against the whole blame being thrown on the Irish population—they were all Reform demonstrations, in fact. They had first the Hyde Park riots, then the Chester affair, and lastly the Killarney demonstration, and they were all organized to demand "Reform" of some kind or other. He should like to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had any intention of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Chester? Noble Lords on the other side of the House must see that outbreaks such as had taken place in Kerry were very much what was to be expected from their own policy.

THE EARL OF DERBY: With regard to the Question put by the noble Earl who has just sat down, I have to say that the Government has decidedly no intention of proposing to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Chester. With regard to the other Question put to me, I regret to say that I heard the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Essex) very imperfectly; but, as far as I understood him, he inquired as to whether the Government intends moving for a continuance of the Act suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland; and, at the same time, the noble Earl expressed a hope that if any of the Fenians connected with the recent disturbances were captured, the utmost rigour of the law would be administered to them; and, also, that military officers would be protected by the Government from any criminal proceedings which might be brought against them in consequence of any acts committed by them in the discharge of their duty. The question is one of such great importance that I think it would have been better if the noble Earl had given me notice of his intention to put it. At the same time, I can quite understand that, as the Act of suspension has so nearly run out its term, your Lordships are all anxious for some information as to the Government's intention with reference to the matter. But I regret I cannot yet give a positive answer to the noble Earl. Your Lordships know that in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne a hope was expressed that the Government would be able to dispense with any exceptional legislation on this subject with regard to Ireland. It must, however, be borne in mind that the recent outbreak, insignificant as it was, was perfectly unexpected and unforeseen by any party. I am happy, however, to say that, from the accounts we have received, the affair has been entirely put down, and that the result has to a great extent refuted the anticipations of the late Lord Lieutenant, who feared that any rising in the country would at once be joined by a large portion of the population. As a matter of fact, the rioters have been joined by no one; they were insignificant in point of number, utterly deserted by everybody, and exercised not the slightest influence on the surrounding population. It is impossible to say at present whether similar insane attempts to theirs may not be made in other parts of Ireland; and I think it better to postpone the consideration of the subject until the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who has returned from Dublin, and who will, of course, be able to furnish the latest information, has been conferred with. As to the prisoners who may be taken, I can assure the noble Earl that the Government will endeavour wisely to discriminate as to the relative guilt of each prisoner; and while, with regard to the highest description of offenders, they will not shrink from enforcing the utmost rigour of the law, yet every case will be judged on its own merits. I am sure, however, that it is not your Lordships' wish that the less guilty should be visited with undue severity. As to the hope expressed by the noble Earl with reference to the officers now in Ireland, I trust it is not necessary to say that, in the discharge of the painful duties which may devolve upon them in suppressing these disturbances, they may rely upon the fullest support from Her Majesty's Government,

THE IRISH LINES.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked, When the Report of the Royal Commission on Railways would be presented; and whether the Government had yet considered the applications for Government interference in the concerns of Irish Railways? He apologized for having introduced the Question at such an early period of the Session, but thought himself justified by the pressing importance of the subject; for in his opinion the most effectual way to improve the condition of Ireland was to aid the development of her material resources.

THE EARL OF DERBY: It is quite true that the Question referred to by the noble Marquess is one of very great importance to Ireland: and the Government have received a great many memorials praying that the subject should be taken up. It is quite true, also, that the evidence taken before the Commissioners has been before the public for some time; but the Commissioners have not yet made their Report, and it may be three weeks or a month before they are able to do so. Until the Report has been presented the Government cannot, of course, come to a conclusion upon the subject. The question is not only of the greatest importance, but also, as the noble Marquess should know, of the greatest difficulty. There can be no question that the railways of Ireland can be more economically managed, and that the great expense to which the different companies are put, solely in consequence of their number, would be very largely decreased if the proprietary were consolidated under one head, with one management. This would not only decrease expense, but probably tend to an increase of productiveness. But, at the same time, we must remember that railway property in Ireland is not in the most prosperous condition; out of the 1,800 miles of railway in the country, only six miles—the line from Dublin to Kingstown—pay a really satisfactory dividend. I am afraid to say how many companies are absolutely bankrupt, or how many have suspended operations altogether. But I must say that Her Majesty's Government are asked to undertake a very grave task when they are invited to undertake the management of such a property as the Irish railways, putting aside pecuniary considerations. I do not understand that the railway companies are at all agreed as to the course they would desire us to pursue, except that they would like us to buy all their railways at their own price—especially those lines which pay no dividend at all; but that would not be a very profitable speculation for the Government to enter upon. Then there are many objections to the proposal that the Government should undertake the management of railway property; there are political reasons, such as the enormous patronage which would in that case be vested in the hands of Ministers. But supposing the Government did buy the railways, a question arises which is not easily answered. We are told that it would be infinitely to the advantage of the country if the railway fares were lowered; and all the railway directors say that lowering the fares would be to the advantage of the companies; but they also agree in saying that the shareholders object to lower the fares because, whatever the ultimate result, the immediate consequence would be a considerable loss. Accordingly, a few of the Irish railway companies desire the Government to bear that loss, though they think it very undesirable the shareholders should do so. On the whole, much difference of opinion prevails upon this question, which demands most serious consideration; and at present I can only promise that, as soon as the Commissioners have furnished us with their Report, we will give our best attention to their recommendations—we will consider how far their recommendations are borne out by the information brought before them and shape our course accordingly.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The Act of 1844 fixes the amount to be paid by the Government as twenty-five years' purchase of the net receipts. But suppose a railway has received nothing, how much will twenty-years' purchase of that amount to?

A Bill to facilitate the Recovery of Arrears of Alimony in certain Cases under Decrees and Orders of the Provincial and Diocesan Courts in Ireland—Was presented by The Viscount LIFFORD; read 1st. (No. 17.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, February 18, 1867.

SELECT COMMITTEE—On Public Accounts nominated.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL SERVICES, 1866-7.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Sugar Duties.

Resolution [Feb. 15] reported—Duty on Dogs.

Ordered—Duty on Dogs; Admiralty Jurisdiction*; Tenants' Improvements (Ireland); Land Improvement and Leasing (Ireland); Land Improvement Contracts (Ireland); Land Tax Commissioners' Names.

First Reading—Admiralty Jurisdiction* [28]; Tenants' Improvements (Ireland) [29]; Land Improvement and Leasing (Ireland) [30]; Land Tax Commissioners' Names* [31].

Second Reading—Trades Unions [18]; Vice President of the Board of Trade [22].

ARMY ESTIMATES.—OBSERVATIONS.

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, the Army Estimates which I have just laid upon the table are only the usual and ordinary Estimates, and they do not include any provision to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Recruiting and the Army Reserve. Separate Estimates will be laid upon the table for those purposes. I intend, when the Estimates are moved, to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Royal Commission on Recruiting and the Army Reserve, and to explain the measures which Her Majesty's Government propose to take in order to carry out the recommendations of that Commission.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN: May I ask when that will be?

GENERAL PEEL: I have just laid the Estimates on the table, and I hope they will be in the hands of hon. Members either on Wednesday or Thursday at the latest. I shall bring them forward on the earliest possible day afterwards, and due notice will be given.

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. ORMSBY GORE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, When the Report, so far as relates to Irish Railways, of the Royal Commissioners, to inquire into the state of Railways will be issued?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, there would be no special Report on Irish Railways; but the Report of the Commissioners would be ready in a short time, probably in a week or two.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENT IN JAMAICA.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any Despatch relative to the reduction of the Ecclesiastical Establishment in Jamaica has been forwarded to the Governor of Jamaica; and, if so, whether he is willing to lay the same before Parliament; and, whether he will lay before Parliament the Circular relative to such reduction addressed to the Clergy by the Bishop of Kingston?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that the despatch alluded to by the hon. Member was simply an acknowledgment of the receipt of a communication and of correspondence between Sir John Grant and the Bishop of Kingston; and all that it stated was, that when matters were more matured the Colonial Office would be ready to take the subject into consideration. The Circular only had reference to certain parochial charges transferred to voluntary contributions; and there was no correspondence on the subject in the Colonial Office that could be given to the House.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.

QUESTION.

MR. BYKYN said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether any, and, if so, what measures have been adopted to prevent the importation from Holland and Germany of the carcases of animals infected by the Cattle Plague?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that the Privy Council were reluctant to prohibit the importation of articles used as food except under the apprehension of serious risk. It appeared to them, as at present advised, that there was no such amount of risk as would justify them in prohibiting the importation of meat.

IRELAND—DOCKS IN CORK HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. MURPHY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, What progress has been made with the works connected with the Royal Docks in Cork Harbour, and their present position; what progress is proposed to be made with them (and the estimated amount of expenditure) in the present year, and whether the supposed amount of Convict Labour originally contemplated will be provided; and, if not, whether Free Labour will be substituted?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the progress made in Cork Harbour hitherto, as the hon. Gentleman is doubtless aware, is only of a preliminary nature. I am happy now to inform him that arrangements have been made by which future progress will, I hope, be made more satisfactory. At the time I had the pleasure of seeing the hon. Member at Cork only 121 convicts were at work. Since then a few free men, leading artificers, have been employed; the number of them has now been increased to thirty; and the number of convicts has been raised to 274. In the forthcoming Estimates we propose to ask, instead of £15,000, for £20,000; and this will enable us to increase the number of free labourers from thirty to nearly 100. I hope the answer will be satisfactory to the hon. Member. I am quite sure it is the intention of Government to prosecute the works at Cork Harbour; and, no doubt, under the circumstances I have mentioned, the works will be greatly accelerated.

SCOTLAND—SANITARY LAWS.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any measure is being prepared by the Lord Advocate for Scotland for the consolidation and application to Scotland of the various Sanitary and Nuisances Acts at present in operation; and, whether he is about to bring in any measure for the more economical settlement of disputes arising in carrying out the Poor Law Act?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that there was a Bill in preparation for consolidating and amending the Law relating to nuisances in Scotland, and he expected that it would be ready in about a fortnight.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt the same means for the collection of Agricultural Statistics in England and Scotland as last year; and, if not, whether it is their intention to introduce any measure this Session for their collection?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that the Government proposed to adopt the same measures that were taken last year.

IRELAND—WATERFORD ELECTION.

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Barry) who had given notice of the Question, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Military authorities have instituted or intend to institute any inquiry, or have taken or intend to take any action, with respect to the alleged conduct of the sixteen men of the 12th Lancers who, on the polling day of the late Election for the County of Waterford, according to the sworn testimony of the officer in command, broke away from his control, and without orders charged the people along the Quay of Dungarvan, the result being that two persons were killed, one of them, a respectable inhabitant of that town, having been, while standing near the door of his dwelling, stabbed by one of the soldiers with a lance, as appears by the reported evidence and verdict of the coroner's jury?

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, in consequence of the Notice given by the hon. and learned Member, I requested the Commander-in-Chief to apply to the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland to know what steps had been taken; and the answer of the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland is as follows:—

"It was considered that it would be unusual and an unbecoming interference with the rights of the constitutional and legal tribunal—the coroner's inquest, and of the judicial proceedings which might result from it—to hold a formal military inquiry into the Dungarvan riots and the matters connected with them—a matter which was entirely in the hands of the civil law of the country, and dealt with by it. The military authorities had exhausted inquiry, and had obtained all the information which was in their power to do on this subject. As regards the conduct of the 12th Lancers, the reports of the superior officer, Colonel Sawyer, commanding the 6th Carbineers, who was sent expressly from Cahir to Dungarvan, to command the troops during the contested election for Waterford, prove, as did all the reports of the other officers commanding detachments employed during the election, that, notwithstanding the greatest provocations, the conduct of the troops was very good; indeed, Colonel Sawyer calls it 'admirable,' and that if casualties among the people, however much to be regretted, did occur, they were unavoidable."

ARMY—MILITARY STORE DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the scheme submitted to the Treasury by the late Secretary of State for War, and supported by the present Secretary of State for War, which was designed to remedy the grievances of the Military Store Department, has been finally rejected by the Lords Commissioners; and, if so, to state upon what grounds a measure judged necessary by the War Office as the best means of increasing the efficiency of a Military Department, and of redressing grievances which are admitted to exist in it, has been rendered inoperative?

MR. HUNT: Sir, I must ask leave to point out to the House the unusual character of the Question. The hon. Member for Stirling does not ask whether a decision has been come to, and on what grounds; but whether there is a difference of opinion between two Departments of the Government, and whether I can state the reasons given by one Department for differing from the other. It must be obvious to the hon. Member that no Government business can be carried on unless matters under consideration are freely discussed between Departments. When a decision has been arrived at, the Government, as a Government, is responsible for it, and it is open to any hon. Member to challenge the propriety of it; but I submit to the House that it will not be to the advantage of the public service that a Question should be asked and answered here as to what difference of opinion exists between one Member of Government and another on a given question before it is decided. Therefore, I hope the hon. Member will not think I am treating him with disrespect when I decline to set a precedent by giving a categorical answer, which could only be mischievous in its results.

ARMY—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question relating to the report of an inquest held on the body of Robert Symes, a private soldier in the 74th Regiment, on whom corporal punishment had been inflicted by sentence of a District Court Martial, on the 24th ultimo. As the Question related to the life and death of one of Her Majesty's subjects, he hoped the House would permit him to state the facts on which he based the Question. ["No, no!"] He was quite in order in stating the facts. It had been stated in many newspapers, and especially in The Lancet, that a soldier belonging to the 74th Highlanders died in the military hospital at Limerick on the 9th instant, after receiving corporal punishment, having been sentenced to receive fifty lashes, and to be confined for 168 days. Shortly afterwards an inquest was held on the body, at which three military medical officers and one civilian gave their evidence. The evidence was to the effect that his death was caused by fever, which set in owing to the punishment which had been inflicted, and the jury found that the deceased died in consequence of congestion of the brain supervening on the punishment to which he had been subjected. Now, he wished to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, Whether the statement given in the newspapers was substantially correct; and whether the punishment which the soldier had received was of undue and extraordinary severity, or no unusual punishment for offences such as he had committed?

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, in consequence of the Notice given by the hon. Gentleman, I sent to Ireland for information on the facts, and I find that they are as follows:—Private Robert Symes, 74th Regiment, was tried by District Court Martial on the 9th of January, for an act of gross insubordination in having struck with his fist a sergeant of the regiment, and kicked him on the face when he was knocked down. He was sentenced to 365 days' imprisonment, with hard labour (197 of which were remitted), and fifty lashes. The staff surgeon examined the man on three different occasions, and pronounced him to be in a good state of health, and able to undergo corporal punishment; he was flogged on the 14th of January, a staff assistant-surgeon being present at the parade. After punishment he was sent to the cells, where he was allowed bedding, &c., and seen daily by a medical officer. On the 29th of January (fourteen days afterwards) he was admitted into hospital suffering from fever; his back had nearly healed. On the next day erysipelas of the face and head set in, and he died on the 9th of February. The post-mortem examination showed that death was occasioned by congestion of the brain consequent on the erysipelas; his back had healed at the time of his death; he had always been a healthy man but of bad character.

METROPOLIS—PARK LANE AND HALKIN STREET.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, If it is intended to widen Park Lane from Stanhope Gate to Oxford Street; and if any and what measures can be taken to abate the inconvenience now existing to foot passengers and carriages by the wooden barriers erected in Halkin Street, which have narrowed this great thoroughfare?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, it is intended to widen Park Lane from Stanhope Gate to Oxford Street; but I must inform the hon. Baronet that I cannot give him an answer to his second Question, as Halkin Street is not in any way under my supervision.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON: May I ask the noble Lord whom I am to apply to?

EARL GROSVENOR: I do not know whether I may be allowed to answer the Question. The buildings in Halkin Street will take about two years to complete, and I do not know whether the hoarding can be removed before the end of that time.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—THE RESOLUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, if the House should agree to the 4th proposed Resolution on the subject of Reform—namely, "That the Occupation Franchise shall be based on the principle of Rating"—the carrying out of that Resolution would, in the view of the Government, be necessarily contingent on the passing of the Bill "for promoting Uniformity of Assessment in England and Wales;" and whether, if the House should agree to the 13th Resolution, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Boundary Commission, the passing of a Reform Bill need on that account be delayed beyond the period of the present Session of Parliament?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the passing of the Bill which we hope to introduce will not in any way depend upon the passing of the two other measures to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. But I trust I may be permitted to express my hope that when the Reform Bill is passed hon. Gentlemen will not deny us the portion of their time that may be requisite to pass the two other measures also.

STANDARDS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—QUESTION.

MR. MILLER said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the fact that the Standards of Weights and Measures have been in use for forty years without re-adjustment, and whether such re-adjustment is intended, and when; and what notice will be given to the public thereof?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, in reply, that the official standards of weight and length have been in use since 1825, or forty-two years, and the standards of capacity since 1834, or thirty-three years, without re-adjustment. No legal provision was made for their comparison and re-verification until the passing of the Standards Act of last Session, by which it was provided that the Board of Trade should cause such comparison to be made as soon as conveniently might be after the passing of the Act, and afterwards, once at least in every five years, and the standards to be adjusted or renewed if requisite. It is intended that this provision shall be carried out under high scientific superintendence, and for this purpose to re-appoint the Standards Commission, the members of which have expressed willingness to serve. All the preliminary steps have been already taken for these objects, and the actual comparison of the standards is now being proceeded with in the Standards Department. The weights have been tested, and it may be satisfactory to state that their actual errors are, generally speaking, so small as to be hardly appreciable, except with very fine balances; the 56 lb. weight is the most defective, and that varies only about a 30,000th part, that is, thirteen grains in 392,000 grains. The adjustment or renewal of the standards will necessarily occupy some time after the appointment of the Commission, but due notice will be given when the whole work is completed.

WATERWORKS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. A. EGBERTON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he intends to re-introduce this Session the Waterworks Bill of last Session?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not.

EXTRADITION OF M. LAMIRANDE.

QUESTION.

MR. McCULLAGH TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When he expects to be able to lay upon the table the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and that of the Emperor of the French regarding the extradition of M. Lamirande?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I will lay the Papers on the table as soon as we have received a further communication from the French Government, for which we are now waiting.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS OF MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MAJOR WALKER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps to improve the position of Quartermasters of Militia?

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, in the Army Estimates which have been laid upon the table, it is proposed to ask the House to consent to an addition to their lodging money.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—FRANCHISES.—QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the Statement which he has promised to make on going into Committee on the Representation of the People on Monday, the 25th instant, he will specify the proposed amount of the County and Borough Franchises; and whether he could, for the convenience of the House, give that information on an earlier day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, it is the hope of Her Majesty's Government that they may introduce and pass a Reform Bill adequate to the national necessities, which will reproduce concord among classes, and will permit Gentlemen, of whatever political opinions they may be, and to whatever party they may belong, if they sit upon this Bench, to have an opportunity of proposing those measures of improvement which the country requires, and which, until this question is settled, I fear will not be introduced. But with these views, and with that great responsibility, I trust the House will feel it not unreasonable or in any degree presumptuous on our part, if we wish at least to have the privilege of disposing of the course of public business in that manner which we deem to be most conducive to the end which we are desirous of accomplishing. Under these circumstances, I must say that I think it would be most inexpedient were I to deviate from that course of proceeding which, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I have already intimated that we are ready to take. There are many reasons which induce me to believe that if we were to alter our course we might injure that chance which, from intimations I have received from many quarters of this House, I confess I view with a sanguine spirit, of coming to a solution of this question. I trust the House will believe that it is from no desire to delay the progress of this business, but from a sincere conviction, founded on the information we have received, that the course we have indicated is best qualified to accomplish the end we all desire, that I must request the hon. Gentleman will not press me to change that course, and I shall be prepared on Monday to offer those explanations which are due to the House.

THEATRES, &c.—QUESTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce any measure this Session for the better regulation of Theatres and Places of Public Amusement in Great Britain; and, whether the measure to be so introduced if any will be in accordance with the recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee of last Session upon that subject?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that he hoped to be enabled to bring in a Bill on the subject. If so, the Bill would embody some of the recommendations of the Committee, but, he apprehended not all.

IRELAND—CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends introducing a measure during the present Session to amend the Laws relative to Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland; and, if so, at what period the Bill will be likely to be furnished to Members?

LORD NAAS: Sir, a Bill has been prepared, and my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland will introduce it, I hope, next week.

IRELAND—THE VARTRY WATERWORKS. QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to a statement made by the Chairman of the Waterworks Committee in the Municipal Council of Dublin, that a substantial leakage had taken place in the great reservoir of the Vartry Waterworks; if he is aware that notice has been served by the surveyor of the county Wicklow on the Waterworks Committee in reference to the dangerous condition of that reservoir; and if it is the intention of the Irish Government to have the reservoir and works inspected by and reported on by Government engineers?

LORD NAAS, in reply, said, the reservoir had been inspected by two eminent engineers, and information of a satisfactory nature had been received; but he was not at present in possession of full information on the subject. He expected the Report in a few days.

IRELAND—FENIAN DISTURBANCES IN KERRY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has any further information to impart to the House with regard to the Fenian movement in Kerry?

LORD NAAS: Sir, I have no further information to give beyond this, that I received a telegram two hours ago stating that everything was perfectly quiet, and that there was no appearance of any attempt being made to revive the insurrectionary movement in the county of Kerry. I may add, that from the information which the Government has received it appears that there was not at any one time more than 120 or 130 engaged in the outbreak.

MR. BRUEN said, he wished to ask the noble Lord, whether he can confirm the published reports of the gallant conduct of Police Constable Duggan, who was attacked by the rioters while carrying despatches? He would also beg to inquire whether the noble Lord can confirm the report of the loyal conduct of the Rev. Mr. Maginn, a Roman Catholic priest, who, it is stated, gave notice to the Police of the intentions of the rioters, endeavoured to dissuade the party from their mad enterprise, and, on being charged by their leader with having given information against them, boldly and loyally acknowledged that he had done so.

LORD NAAS: I am happy to be able to say that the statement which appeared in The Times of this morning with regard to Police Constable Duggan is entirely correct. He showed the greatest possible gallantry and devotion to his duty. After being wounded, and after falling from his horse, he still endeavoured to struggle on as best he could in order to perform his duty. He was, unfortunately, unable to accomplish this, and was obliged to take refuge in a house, whither he was followed by some of his assailants. With respect to the conduct of the Rev. Mr. Maginn, the information in the hands of the Government leads us to believe that the statement which has been published is perfectly correct. Shortly after the attack on the policeman the same party designed to attack the police barrack at Ross Bay, not very far off. On meeting Mr. Maginn they stopped, and he addressed them. He warned them of the perilous and wicked course they were pursuing, and endeavoured to dissuade them from carrying into effect the project which he had been led to believe they entertained. They advanced, however, some little distance further, but wiser counsels ultimately prevailed, and when they had got to within 200 yards of the barracks they turned off the road and made for the mountains. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to the help of the wounded man, and I believe remained with him a considerable time, until further assistance arrived.

VICE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE BILL.—[BILL 22.] (Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Cave, Mr. Hunt.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GRENFELL said, he did not rise to oppose the Bill; but he wished for some explanation with regard to the omission from the Bill of all allusion to the office of Paymaster General, and certain duties connected with Chelsea Hospital at present performed by the Vice President of the Board of Trade. He hoped some explanation would be given of the intentions of the Government on these two points, which were rather connected with a Military Department than with the Board of Trade.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Had the hon. Member been in the House the other night when I introduced the Bill he would have been aware that I gave an explanation on both the points on which he now asks for information. I then stated that arrangements would be made for the discharge of the duties to which the hon. Member refers. It would be useless to insert provisions on the subject in the Bill, since Her Majesty may appoint any officer she pleases to undertake those services. It is not necessary—indeed, it would be inconvenient—to prescribe those duties in an Act of Parliament.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the Vice President of the Board of Trade had hitherto vacated his seat on accepting office, whereas the Secretaries of the Poor Law Board, the Admiralty, and the Treasury were not required to undergo re-election. He wished, therefore, to know whether, under the present Bill, the Secretary to the Board of Trade would have to go to his constituents, or whether he would be in the same position as the Secretaries of other Departments?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: He will not require re-election.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought this raised a very important Constitutional question, because one Member of the Government less than at present would vacate his seat on taking office. The point would require consideration when the Bill was in Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he regretted that the attention of the House had not been drawn to this point when his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) introduced the Bill; for the vacating of a seat upon accepting an office under the Crown was a matter of no small importance both in theory and in practice, and one on which both the House and the country entertained a very just jealousy. His notice having only been drawn to the matter a few moments ago, he would not now undertake to say whether there might or might not be sufficient grounds for the alteration proposed; but the question was one of primary importance, and his right hon. Friend would probably share in his regret that he had not referred to it in the first instance. He was very unwilling to delay the progress of a Bill which appeared to be generally of a useful character; but the matter would require careful consideration at a future stage.

Motion agreed to: Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SUGAR DUTIES.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he could not allow the House to go into Committee without again entering his protest against the system of classified sugar duties, the object of which was to give protection to one class of sugar growers at the expense of others. He did not blame the present Government for bringing forward this measure; if it had originated with them there would probably have been a storm of objection to it, as a Tory monopoly scheme. He regretted to say that this measure originated with the leader of free trade in this House, the right hon. Member for Lancashire. The Vice President of the Board of Trade told the House the other night that the duties were, by this Bill, levied on the precise quantity of saccharine matter contained in each class of sugars. Now, it was nothing of the kind. The duties were really levied upon the samples of sugar laid before the Custom House officers, who decided from their appearance what rate of duty each should pay; and as no man could tell from the appearance of sugar what quantity of saccharine matter it contained, it opened the door to injustice and fraud. Besides, this absurd system was attended with enormous expense. According to the Report of the Board of Inland Revenue, in London alone no less than 632,738 samples of sugar, representing 3,123,000 packages, were assessed for duty by the Customs officers. Now, as no two packages of sugar were of precisely the same colour, grain, and quality, some must be charged too much and others too little, what a door is open to fraud! The fact is, that all this labour and expense incurred by the classification of duties is solely to protect West India sugar planters, who persist in old methods of making sugar. He believed that this was the only protection Act on the statute book, and he hoped it would not be long before they were able to say that protection did not exist in this country. Undoubtedly this Bill reduced the amount of protection, and so far it was an approximation to the only sound system of an uniform duty. But the protection was of the worst character; it was a tax upon improvement; it taxed those able to make sugar of a better quality, from the same raw material, by a superior process. Suppose Manchester and Blackburn were each making a particular kind of yarn from the same quality of cotton, and that the Manchester people, in consequence of superior processes and superior machinery, were able to sell their yarn at 1*d.* per pound less than the Blackburn people, what should we say to the prayer of the Blackburn people that a duty of 1*d.* per pound ought to be laid upon the Manchester yarn to enable them to compete with their rivals? But this was just what the West India planters demanded, and which this Bill granted. He (Mr. J. B. Smith) was of opinion, with the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), before that Gentleman ate his own words, that—

“To strike with a superior duty one pound of sugar, which by a better mode of manufacture contains more saccharine matter than another pound, obtained from the same raw material, is to inflict direct discouragement upon improvement.”

The whole case could not be better expressed than in this language, and he should only, therefore, repeat his protest against the present system.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution 1. That there shall be charged and paid, on and after the 1st day of March, 1867, the following Duties of Excise on Sugar made in the United Kingdom (that is to say):—

Candy, brown or white, refined	£	s.	d.
Sugar, or Sugar rendered by any process equal in quality thereto, and manufactures of refined Sugar
the cwt.	0	12	0

Sugar not equal to refined, according to the Standard Samples approved by the Lords of the Treasury for assessing the Duties of Customs on Sugar imported into the United Kingdom, viz:—

First Class	the cwt.	0	11	3
Second Class	the cwt.	0	10	6
Third Class	the cwt.	0	9	7
Fourth Class	the cwt.	0	8	0
Molasses	the cwt.	0	3	6

Mr. HUNT said, that before moving the second Resolution, he wished to explain that its object was to place the Excise duty on sugar used in brewing on the same footing as the Customs duty. The sugar used in brewing paid a duty of 3*s.* 4*d.*; this being sugar of the fourth class would now pay a Customs duty of 8*s.* It used to be 8*s.* 2*d.* before the alteration, and it was necessary to put on the brewing duty, the 2*d.* that was thus taken off, so that the duty on 210 lbs. of sugar should be equal to the duty on a quarter of malt.

Resolution 2. That there shall be charged and paid for and upon every hundred-weight, and so in proportion for any greater or less quantity than a hundred-weight, of all Sugar which, on and after the 1st day of March, 1867, shall be used by any Brewer of Beer for sale in the brewing or making of Beer, the Excise Duty of Three Shillings and Six Pence.

Resolutions to be reported on Wednesday.

BILL ORDERED.

Resolution [February] 15 reported.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the proposal; but there were two points upon which he desired to receive an explanation on the part of the Government. The present duty was 12*s.* on every dog. It was, however, found that this duty was too high to be levied with the uniformity and strictness which policy and justice alike required, and, therefore, in the policy of the proposed reduction he fully concurred. But then the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) had stated that it was the expectation and desire of the Government to raise from the new tax an amount not less than that now levied. Whether this expectation would be realized turned upon the question whether the new duty of 5*s.* could be strictly and uniformly levied. He hoped it would; but this was a point on which the Government of the day would be better able to form a conclusion. The first assurance he wished to receive was that the Government had fixed upon an amount which, in their opinion, might be charged alike upon all members of the community and obtained from them. The second point—which was of a different nature and of some importance—was that although this was not a financial measure of very great importance, yet it was the commutation of a duty that yielded £180,000 a year, and which independent of any increase under the duty would not yield half that amount—perhaps not more than £70,000 or £80,000. Prima facie such dealing with the revenue ought to be treated as a portion of the financial measures of the year, and form part of the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had always held that there was nothing more closely connected with the constitutional control of the House of Commons than the principle that, except under special circumstances, all the financial measures of the year ought to form part of the same plan. Of course, in some cases where strong practical reasons existed it might be desirable to depart from this rule. The cause of this departure probably was that the duty, instead of being, as before, a part of the assessed taxes, would now be an Excise duty. The assessed taxes were levied each year on the number of dogs kept in the former year; while the Excise duty was payable beforehand, and the commencement of the financial year would be fixed as the period at which the tax must be taken out. If he were correct in this supposition he had no objection to the proposal.

MR. HUNT said, he would answer the second Question first. It was desirable that, as the duty on dogs was hereafter to be a duty of Excise, the change should be arranged to take place at an earlier period of the year than the Financial Statement, as otherwise a great number of the owners of dogs would escape the tax this year altogether. The assessed taxes for 1866-7, although due this year, were not chargeable until April 5 next. Under the new duty it would be necessary for those who wished to keep dogs this year to take out an Excise licence. For this reason it was desirable not to defer levying the tax until the usual financial arrangements of the year were made. In answer to the first Question of the right hon. Gentleman, the Government were of opinion that the tax of 5s. on every dog was one that could really and uniformly be levied. The Government proposed that there should be no exemptions whatever. When the Resolutions were in Committee his hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk (Mr. Read) stated, that although he understood it was intended to levy the tax on sheep dogs, he considered it so important that the proposal of the Government should be carried that he was willing to waive the exemption which that description of dogs had hitherto enjoyed. If the owners of sheep dogs were ready to give up their exemption, that was a test of the duty of 5s. being one which the community would bear to see universally levied on dogs. As the present duty of 12s. was only levied on a very small number of those who now kept dogs, the revenue would not, in his opinion, suffer from the reduction. He rather looked forward, on the contrary, to some increase of the proceeds of the tax under the new duty.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON, Mr. HUNT, and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

COMMANDER SAYER'S LIFE BOAT.

QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN wished to put a Question to the First Lord of the Admiralty respecting the invention by Commander Sayer of a folding life-boat which had been brought under the notice of that Department. Commander Sayer was a naval officer of some experience, who, many years ago, was much struck by the too frequent loss of life from shipwreck or fire at sea, in consequence of the insufficient number of boats carried by vessels. Actuated by no hope of pecuniary benefit to himself, but solely by the humane and laudable desire of mitigating the severity of future disasters at sea, he had devoted much attention to the subject. The result was, that after some expenditure of time and money, he had invented a life-boat, in the construction of which, such was the economy of space, that in the space usually occupied by one ships' boat, a sufficient number of these boats could be stowed away to hold from 800 to 1,000 persons in case of emergency. It would be presumptuous in him to pass any opinion on the merits of the boat; but when Commander Sayer requested him, as his representative, to bring the invention under the notice of the proper authorities, it was his duty so to do. The invention had been submitted to the late Board of Admiralty, of which Lord Clarence Paget was then Secretary, but the reception it met with was not very favourable. The boat was tried at Portsmouth in fine weather, but was not sufficiently tested in rough weather, and Commander Sayer, being satisfied with the result of private trials, became dissatisfied with the conduct of the Admiralty. He consulted him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) again, and, by his advice, sought the opinions of naval officers independent of the Government. Amongst others, he took counsel and advice with the hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), who brought his great professional skill to bear on the subject, and after, doubtless, due consideration, thus wrote to the inventor—

"You should compel Mr. Hugessen and Lord Clarence Paget to give you proper support. Tell them I say so. It is the business of them both to see that so useful an invention is not lost to the country."

In answer to a Question put to him on the subject in that House in 1865, Lord Clarence Paget, then Secretary of the Admiralty, said that though the invention was ingenious, and one that might be useful in time of war, yet it was not then thought expedient to make further experiments with it. Fortified by the opinion of the hon. Baronet, Commander Sayer became more than ever discontented with the conduct of the Admiralty; and at the General Election in 1865 he withdrew his support in county and borough from all candidates, with the exception of him (Mr. Knatchbull - Hugessen), who had formed the late Administration. But let the House mark the sequel. Within the brief space of one year the changes and chances of political warfare drove from office those reckless despisers of inventive genius, and hope again dawned on Commander Sayer when he saw the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) again engaged in the congenial task of re-constructing the navy, and seated by his side at the Board that very individual who had pronounced this invention too valuable to be lost to the country. Hope dawned again on Commander Sayer—but alas for the instability of human expectation! He sent his plans and models to the new Board of Admiralty; but they were returned to him with a note from the hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir John Hay)—and this was the "unkindest cut of all"—saying, that however ingenious the invention might be, the Admiralty were not prepared to adopt it for the navy. He must add that Commander Sayer attributed the refusal to his declining to have any personal communication with the Controller of the Navy, by whom he complained of having been treated with great incivility at a former interview. With that he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had nothing to do. He only knew that the models had been some weeks at the Admiralty, and the hon. Baronet would never have given the opinion which he had read to the House unless he had mastered the invention, so as to be fully able to explain to the Controller, or anyone else, that which he averred to be too useful to be lost to the country. He would respectfully suggest to the right hon. Baronet that, whereas of late years they had spent enormous sums in bringing to perfection instruments for the destruction of human life, when the question concerned an invention for saving that life, it surely would not tarnish the lustre of the right hon. Baronet's Administration if to such an invention he gave some consideration and some encouragement. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, What communications had taken place between the Admiralty and Commander Sayer on that subject?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the invention in question, whatever its merits, was of so simple and small a character that it was only through the partial views of the hon. Gentleman that it could be connected with the re-construction of the navy, towards which it would go but a very little way. He remembered that Commander Sayer had brought the subject under his notice in the lobby of the House some time since; and soon after he had the honour of holding his present office, Commander Sayer submitted his invention to the present Board of Admiralty, which took the course that was always followed when such inventions were brought before them—namely, referred them to the departments with which such matters were connected. The Board were desirous of giving a fair trial to his invention, and they directed that it should be considered by the Controller of the Navy. When the notice of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) appeared on the paper, he made inquiries, and the answer he received was that Commander Sayer had had some personal difference with the Controller of the Navy, and was so much offended with that gentleman that he would not consent to his examining into his invention. They were perfectly ready to give a fair trial to the invention; but if Commander Sayer persisted in his unfortunate objection to have any connection with the officer who was the proper person to deal with the matter, it was to be feared that the subject must remain in abeyance for some time.

MR. STAYNER, LATE DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL, CANADA.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS wished to call attention to a Treasury Minute granting a Compassionate Allowance to Mr. Stayner, late Deputy Postmaster General in Canada. He did not at all object to the grant of this allowance, which was no doubt made on grounds that were satisfactory to the Treasury; but to the form and manner of making it. Mr. Stayner's salary had been paid out of the postal revenues of Canada, which in 1851 or 1852 were handed over to the Provincial Governments, without any provision being made at the time that existing public servants holding warrants from the Postmaster General in England should be protected. Changes were afterwards made by the Canadian Government, involving the loss of his office, and Mr. Stayner applied for some compensation. Now, the Treasury had laid the Minute on the table as if the allowance made him were an ordinary pension under the Superannuation Act; whereas, in fact, it was not in any sense a grant under that Act. The proper course would have been for the Government to have specially called the attention of the House to the matter, and proposed that some compensation should be given to this gentleman, not for the loss of an appointment to which the Act referred, but because the Government in 1851 had omitted to provide some protection for him. It was desirable to prevent these things from becoming precedents; and therefore he trusted that the present inaccurate Minute would be withdrawn, and an amended one substituted for it and laid on the table in the usual course, and that a Motion would be made that it should be printed, so that the real facts should be within the knowledge of the House.

MR. HUNT said, that the words referring to the Superannuation Act had been inserted purely by inadvertence in the Minute in question in consequence of the gentleman who drew the Minute having been misled by following the precedent of the grant of a pension to the Postmaster General of Jamaica. Mr. Stayner was appointed by the Postmaster General here, and, though paid out of the colonial funds, was virtually an Imperial servant. He had been removed from his position because the Colonial Legislature deemed it expedient that it should be filled by a political officer. For the loss thus occasioned Mr. Stayner had not been compensated by the colony, and the Treasury had therefore thought it right to make him a certain allowance. If his hon. Friend was of opinion that it was desirable, he should be happy to withdraw the present Minute and have it amended, and lay another Minute not drawn under the Act on the table.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—THE RESOLUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON, who had a Notice on the paper—

“To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it will be necessary to proceed with the Committee on the Representation of the People if he receives sufficient assurances that no obstacle will be interposed to his proceeding to a Committee on his intended Bill for amending the Laws relating to the Representation of the People,” said, he considered it to be his duty, notwithstanding what had been said that evening, to press upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of which he had given notice. It had occurred before now in the proceedings of the House that when considerable embarrassment was felt on the part of a great number of hon. Members in arriving at a satisfactory determination on any important subject about to be brought under their notice, great advantage had arisen from some preliminary conversation on the point before they reached that stage where party excitement was aroused, and when they came there arrayed on one side and on the other, and prepared to discuss the question rather for the sake of victory, perhaps, than for the solution of it upon its intrinsic merits. Therefore, in regard to the state of the great question of Reform it might be desirable that in anticipation of the explanations promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday, they should endeavour to arrive at some understanding as to the best mode in which the House might express its determination upon the leading and most important points awaiting its decision. He did not press his Question on the Chancellor of the Exchequer in any spirit of discourtesy or of hostility to the Government. He could quite understand how it should have occurred to them, having regard to some historic facts, to have re-introduced this subject of Reform in a somewhat unusual and circuitous manner, so as to protect themselves from a repetition of what had previously taken place. He could quite understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, recollecting how on two former occasions a Conservative Government had been subverted by the proceedings of their opponents, must have felt, in endeavouring for the second time to approach one of the subjects which led to their destruction, very desirous to protect himself from the repetition of a similar mode of attack. He did not, therefore, complain because the Government had taken a somewhat circuitous course of bringing the subject of Parliamentary Reform under the consideration of the House. He did not think he should be permitted by the rules of debate to examine in any detail the course the Government proposed to pursue; because he would not be allowed to examine the Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of seeing whether they were intricate, complex, or difficult to deal with, or whether, in point of fact, they were likely to embarrass the House in its proceedings, rather than to elucidate the subject which they had to discuss. Still less should he be allowed to refer to those Resolutions for the purpose of asking how far they were consistent with all that was urged during the last Session of Parliament against the proceedings of the late Government, in not disclosing fully, completely, and at once, their entire scheme with regard to Reform. He thought it unnecessary to allude further to these points; because since the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer first brought this subject under the consideration of the House, he had made an announcement of the utmost importance, and one that, regarded from that (the Opposition) side of the House, must naturally affect any course that they might otherwise have been inclined to pursue. The subject had been presented to them in an entirely new light by the announcement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Government would be at once prepared to lay before the House a Bill which would explain and develop the Resolutions that had been laid upon the table. They were now no longer under the impression, as it were, that the Government were groping in the dark—that they were going into Committee for the purpose of finding out what the inclinations of the House might be. The Government had now announced that they were prepared to accept the full responsibility of placing a Reform Bill on the table of the House. [An hon. MEMBER: No!] His hon. Friend behind him said "No;" but he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have made a statement substantially to the effect that the Government were prepared to accept the full and undivided responsibility of laying a Bill on the table of the House that would fully explain and develop the general propositions contained in their Resolutions. If that was so, he was entitled to ask what necessity there really was for any preliminary proceedings such as had been proposed? What ground had the Government now to fear that they would be met on this occasion by courses such as those to which he had referred? It was true that many hon. Members on that side of the House took part in the proceedings of 1859; but he thought they ought not to forget that they were now led by a right hon. Gentleman who took no part in those proceedings, or in the anterior proceedings to which he had adverted. As far as they could judge—as far as they had the right to form an opinion from everything the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had said, not only when he was sitting on the Ministerial Bench, but also since he sat on the Opposition side of the House—the right hon. Gentleman had no great respect for those precedents, and had little desire to imitate them, and was rather of the opinion that what then happened had not been much for the interests of the country. The question then arose, who were the persons who were likely to obstruct the progress of the Government with their Bill? Who was prepared to repeat the tactics the use of which in 1859 had since been so frequently condemned? He confessed he was quite at a loss to know. No doubt some hon. Members on his own side of the House had expressed the strongest objection to any reduction of the franchise at all; but their numbers were comparatively few, and however powerful they might be in debate, they certainly could exercise no very great influence on the division list. Well, what other ground was there for anticipating that the Government would be obstructed in their endeavours to carry a measure of Reform? It was true there were also some hon. Gentlemen—but their numbers were still fewer than those whom he had before referred to—who thought that upon some grounds of political philosophy and morality a Conservative Government ought not to be allowed to bring in a Reform Bill at all. He did not think, however, that this opinion had been so far recognised as to be a source of danger or distrust to the Government. In the present day, when the doctrine of development was so fashionable, he could see no reason why a Conservative Government should not develop a Reform Bill as well as any other party in the State. What cause of difficulty then remained. Where was the real necessity for the circuitous method proposed by the Government? He was unable to find them. He was bound to say that he had heard expressed by hon. Members on his side of the House such disinterested views—he thought he might say, without flattery, such patriotic views—on this subject—such an entire disregard of all the pretensions that they might have made as belonging to a great, and perhaps he might say an ascendant party in the State, that he entertained a deep conviction that there was an anxious desire—on the part of many of them at any rate—to assist in every way the progress of the Bill, so that they might have at the earliest period a legitimate and proper opportunity of expressing the opinions that would arise in the solution of this great question. Well, then, he said that, looking also to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), in withdrawing the Reform Bill last Session, and looking also to what the right hon. Gentleman had said in the present Session, he was justified in believing that the right hon. Gentleman would be ready to lend his assistance to the Government in a frank and loyal spirit, and so to enable the House to legislate successfully on this subject without further delay. If he had taken a right view of the subject, he wanted to know why the Government should pursue a career which was pregnant with the greatest embarrassment, difficulty, and perplexity to the House? It would be much better if they could accomplish that which was avowed to be the real object and purpose of the Government without this embarrassment and perplexity; and he thought that it would tend not only to the honour of the Government, but to the honour also of the entire House, if they at once adopted the more usual and more suitable course of proceeding to legislate on this subject by Bill. No doubt, as the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had said that night, the Government were entitled to prescribe the course they thought it right to adopt;

nor did it in any way derogate from their views on this subject when he asked them to alter their present course and prescribe a different one, provided they had sufficient assurance that that course would not result in embarrassment and perplexity. It was the province of the right hon. Gentleman to lay down to the House the mode in which the House should proceed with the consideration of any great measure. He occupied a position which required him to take the initiative and to act for the Government. On the other hand, the Leader of the Opposition could take no course until the Government had completely developed their views on the subject. As he hoped that any overture on the part of the Government would be met on that (the Opposition) side of the House in the most frank and liberal manner, he thought the right hon. Gentleman would do well to indicate his disposition to waive the preliminary proceedings of the Government if he had that satisfaction accorded to him in return. He therefore pressed upon the right hon. Gentleman the Question of which he had given notice, and was sure the Government would sacrifice nothing of its importance or dignity by acceding to that request; and if they could dispense with long debates on the abstract question, and on hypothetical grounds, and get to the investigation of the measure itself, it would tend not only to maintain the reputation of the Government, but what was still more important, the reputation and honour of the House, and the just influence which it ought to exercise over the minds of the people of this country. The hon. and learned Member then repeated his Question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am quite willing to accept the assurance of the hon. Gentleman that his observations are made in no unfriendly spirit to the Government, and in a similar spirit I respond to them. I can assure him that he has mistaken the character of the Administration if he fancies they have formed an erroneous or exaggerated idea of their own importance. They are only anxious to use such influence as they possess to favour the advancement of good legislation in this House, and if possible the settlement of the important question which has so much occupied the attention of the Parliament and the country. I must say, with great respect to the hon. Gentleman, that I cannot think we have erred in the course we have adopted. In taking that course we have been guided by a strict adherence to Parliamentary precedent and practice, not from any superstitious veneration for them, but because we know that our precedents embalm the wisdom and reflect the practical sagacity of former generations. We thought it absolutely necessary to have recourse to procedure by way of Resolution; and when I addressed the House a week ago, if I had confined myself to arguments in favour of that procedure, and had given the main reasons which had induced the Government to adopt that course, I should have been strictly in order, and nothing more would have been required of me. But representations were made to me by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to the effect that it was desirable that the general character of the Resolutions should be known, and that the House should understand whether the Resolutions expressed general principles or went into great detail. Therefore, I wished frankly to explain to the House that the Resolutions expressed principles, and I took the opportunity of vindicating in some degree the course pursued. I think it impossible to bring forward Resolutions as the basis of legislation, especially on a subject so vast as that of the representation of the people in Parliament, except in the way of expressing principles, and I cannot see we have any cause to regret the course we have pursued. From all that has happened since, I have reason to believe that the prospect of legislation on this subject has been advanced and facilitated, and nothing has been said or done by the Government, notwithstanding the criticisms offered here and elsewhere, which the Government have cause to regret or wish to see altered. Therefore, I hope that they may be allowed to pursue the course they have selected to follow. They would not pursue that course if they believed it would lead to delay. On the contrary, I am convinced that, with that candid reception on the part of the House on which we now rely, the course adopted by the Government is one calculated to facilitate the ultimate settlement of the matters in question. The Resolutions are on the table of the House. It would be irregular to enter now into a discussion of their character—as the hon. Gentleman has studiously refrained from discussing them, I think I ought also to refrain from doing so; but this I may say, that the Resolutions express principles, and the Government will put the House in possession of the application of the principles expressed in the Resolutions which they recommend. It is possible, in the situation in which the Question is now placed, that in adopting these principles the House may think proper to apply them in a manner different from that proposed by the Government; but, at the same time, it would be most unwise in the Government to lose the advantage of the discussion which would arise on the Resolutions, and we believe that, without occasioning delay, the passing of them by the House will greatly facilitate the progress of the measure we shall have to introduce. I trust that the House, considering the difficulty of managing this question, will put a charitable construction on the motives of Ministers, and not believe that they have had recourse to the procedure they have selected in order merely to amuse the House for a time, with a view to the ultimate postponement or procrastination of the subject. They have resolved to use their utmost energy in forwarding the settlement of the question; they have put their hands to the plough, and they will not desist from the work unless arrested in their labours by the House, or until the field is tilled.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am prepared to bestow that charitable construction on the motives of the Government for which the right hon. Gentleman has made an appeal; and I think that the best mode of doing so is to avoid all imputation or reference of whatever kind with respect to the motives of the Government. We are here embarked in a common cause. I am bound, however, to say I think my hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton), who received just credit from the right hon. Gentleman for the spirit of his observations, was so far justified in the course he has taken, inasmuch as he endeavoured to give expression to the feeling generally entertained in the House that we are placed in a position of considerable embarrassment. As I understand the case, there are in the country and in the House various currents of feeling with respect to the subject of Parliamentary Reform. Some of these currents are in opposite directions, and tend to neutralize one another. Some are desirous of extensive enfranchisement, others fearful of its consequences. They are opposed to each other; but I venture to say there is one powerful and prevailing feeling which, I think, pervades nearly the whole community united, and which likewise is reflected faithfully and generally within these walls, without reference to political opinion, and that is a strong and earnest—I might venture to say an absorbing and overpowering—desire that we should now, within the limits of this present Session, arrive at length at a legislative settlement of this question. There being that desire in the House and the country, it follows that what we wish for includes this important point likewise, that the question should be settled if possible by those who are now in power. It is wholly out of the ability and capacity of any one set of men to conduct the deliberations of this House to a real and satisfactory issue with respect to the representation of the people unless they be the responsible Advisers of the Crown. We have before us a Government, and as far as I am individually concerned, I have expressed my perfect willingness and earnest desire—and I believe that in so doing I have expressed the sentiments of many others on this side—to co-operate with the present Government for an effectual and, above all, an early settlement of this question. What we are anxious for is that the Government should avail themselves of this favourable state of feeling, and take all steps to conduct to a practical effect this disposition so generally prevailing in the House. The Government have presented Resolutions on the subject of Reform, and I, for one, have stated a perfect willingness—suppressing, I am bound to say, my own strong opinion that such was not an expedient course—to accede to the mode adopted by the Government, and to take no objection on general grounds to the course of proceeding by Resolution. But the right hon. Gentleman will be aware that we listened with much anxiety and with careful attention to the justification which he, as the organ of the Government, made for the mode of procedure which he had proposed for our adoption. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave a special reason for that course, stating in effect—for I do not pretend to quote his words—that had the Government submitted their intentions with respect to Reform in the shape of a Bill, they might have been met, as on a former occasion, by the invidious selection of some one point from among the provisions, and thereby their general and comprehensive scheme might have been by no very legitimate process got rid of in this House. My hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton) has endeavoured to convey to the Government the assurance that there was not the smallest probability of such a proceeding; and after what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as well as from my hon. Friend, I cannot help expressing my strong belief in conformity with his. Sir, of course it would be presumptuous in me were I to undertake to bind any Gentleman in this House, far less any body of the Members of this House, by the expression of an opinion of my own beyond the limits to which my personal communications, may have extended; but, at the same time, the circumstances of this case are so clear, and they have assumed a character so historical, that I can hardly think they leave a doubt on the mind of the Government or the right hon. Gentleman for the apprehension he has expressed, and which he has stated led him to the conclusion he has announced. The right hon. Gentleman adverted on a former evening in terms of disparagement and censure to the proceedings of 1859. I am not bound to defend those proceedings further than to say I do not think they merited the kind of censure bestowed upon them. That, however, is immaterial, except so far as to guard me as to what I have further to say. The proceedings of 1859, whether prudent or not, would in my opinion have been perfectly justifiable, had they been taken by a Parliament that had its heart and its mind earnestly set on legislating for the purpose of Parliamentary Reform. But now, with the light that experience affords, it is impossible to regard the proceedings of 1859 without including in our review the proceedings of 1860; and taking the operations of these two years as one operation—taking the strong and decisive measure adopted in 1859 together with the lame and unsatisfactory completion of it in 1860—I am certain I cannot misrepresent either the public sentiment, or the general sentiment of this House, or the sentiment of the powerful party that occupies these Benches, when I say that these proceedings cannot be repeated. Therefore, the reasons assigned by the right hon. Gentleman for the course he has adopted have disappeared; and undoubtedly it would have been to me a matter of great gratification had the right hon. Gentleman been disposed to accede to the suggestion offered to him in no unfriendly manner by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. From what he has stated, I fear he is not disposed to accede to that suggestion. For my part, whatever my regret and concern may be, I do not withdraw from any assurance I have ventured to give. I do not refuse, for one, to entertain the method of procedure by Resolution ; but I must observe, that at the present moment we are placed in a peculiar position, especially with reference to a particular point. We are greatly desirous of prompt proceeding, and another request was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer of a much more limited character than that which proceeded from my hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets ; it was that we might be favoured upon the earliest day—upon a day earlier than Monday next—with those additional explanations to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and which he calls the explanations of the Government Resolutions which are due to the House. Sir, I will not so far bring into question the Orders of this House as to make a single observation on the character of the Resolutions themselves—as to their being general or precise, as to their being declarations of principle or of practice—what they may or may not be ; but this I must observe, that upon the comparatively narrow point raised by the request I have just referred to we are in a position, so far as I know, without precedent. On Monday last the right hon. Gentleman gave us an explanation of the Resolutions. The right hon. Gentleman most properly recognised the Parliamentary rule that a measure of such a character cannot be advantageously considered by the House immediately after the statement of its principles by the Minister of the Crown. He proceeded in the same manner as does every Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the somewhat analogous question of the Financial Statement of the year. He submits the Financial Statement, but he never asks the assent of the House to that statement until a future day ; or if for financial reasons the affirmation is asked of any particular proposition, it is always considered a mere formal affirmation, and its merits remain open to further consideration. That principle is well established. We thought we had received the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the propositions of the Government on Monday last, and we thought we should be in a position on the 25th to proceed with their discussion ; but we find now—not to-day only, but on a previous occasion, on Friday—that we have not yet the full explanation of the right hon. Gentleman. We are in possession of one moiety of that explanation, and the other moiety of the explanation is to be delivered on the very day on which we are to be invited to consider the Resolutions. Therefore, Sir, it appears to me that it was with consistency and propriety that my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) suggested that, as time is admitted to be of such value in this matter, and as the principle is recognised that the Ministerial explanations of a plan or proposition of this kind ought to be in the possession of the House before Members are called on to vote upon it, the right hon. Gentleman would at least have been disposed to accede to that limited and moderate demand, and afford his explanations on an earlier day than Monday next. These explanations, it is quite evident, must be very important explanations. So far as I know, it is very rare—indeed, I do not recollect any example of a Minister in submitting Resolutions that are to be adopted in Committee of the House—to introduce them, not by one, but by two statements of the views of the Government. I am fearful of treading on tender ground, and therefore I confine these remarks simply to matters of fact, patent to us all ; but I own I am hardly so sanguine as to believe that it will be possible for the House, after receiving the second statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which must necessarily be a statement in enlargement of the first, and which may possibly be a statement in modification of the first—I do not at the present moment see how the House can be in a position to proceed with advantage to a definitive judgment on the Resolutions on Monday next, unless it be the pleasure of the right hon. Gentleman to save, I think, our time and expedite the progress of business by favouring us at an earlier period with those explanations which, as he says, still remain due to the House. Sir, I feel deeply the responsibility which attaches to us all in the present state of affairs. I hope that I have endeavoured in these remarks to confine myself exclusively and rigidly to what is connected with prompt and effectual progress in dealing with this question. The observation I point out is that I fear a farther delay beyond Monday may have to be encountered, unless the right hon. Gentleman can accede to the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds ; that these delays, if multiplied, will become highly unsatisfactory both to the House and to the country. Having said so much, I leave it to the impartial consideration of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government whether they cannot in some way or other meet the desire—we think not an unreasonable desire—that without any avoidable loss of time whatever we should find ourselves brought to deal practically with the great issues involved in the subject of the Representation of the People.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

SUPPLY—SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL SERVICES 1866-7.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £45,721, Purchase of the Blacas Collection of Coins and Antiquities for the British Museum.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in proposing a Vote for the purchase of this collection, said, the Government were induced during the autumn to take on themselves the responsibility of making the purchase of, I believe, the most celebrated private collection connected with ancient art. That was a step which, of course, we could only take with great reluctance; but we were compelled to take it by a sense of duty, and I hope we shall have the sanction of the House for the course we have adopted. Sir, this was the purchase of a collection which had been formed by the Dukes de Blacas during the present and the latter part of the last century. Of it it may be said that everything therein was choice, much was rare, and some things were unique. The attention of the Trustees of the British Museum was drawn to the circumstance that at the end of the autumn, by the law of inheritance that prevails in France, this great collection would probably be in the market. There was a particular reason why the attention of the Trustees of the British Museum—irrespective of their anxiety, when such opportunities are offered, to secure for the country specimens of art of a very choice or rare character—was attracted to the Blacas Collection. In our national collection of ancient art, which, on the whole, may be described as unrivalled, there is one great deficiency. It possesses no collection of ancient gems of any reputation. Now, the most rare and valuable portion of the Blacas Collection consists in a number of gems unrivalled in any private collection in Europe, that of Blenheim alone excepted. It was therefore of great consequence that these gems should be obtained for our Museum. One great reason why that consequence was so urgent was that no such opportunity would probably ever occur again, and, most certainly, not in this century. All the celebrated gems of antiquity are now well known, and most of them form part of Royal or Imperial collections. It is at St. Petersburg, Berlin, Vienna, and Paris, that the most valuable of these antique gems are to be found; while England, notwithstanding the celebrity of her British Museum, was almost entirely deficient in specimens of these works, which are among the most exquisite and rarest works of ancient art. It was obvious, from all intelligence that reached us upon the subject, that the Blacas Collection would be purchased by some foreign State, should we fail to secure it for ourselves; and, indeed, we were aware that the Emperor of the French had already appointed a committee to examine these treasures in order that they might be obtained for the French nation. There was, of course, considerable hesitation on the part of the Trustees of the British Museum—a hesitation which was naturally shared by Her Majesty's Government—as to the purchase of the whole of this collection. Had not this collection been purchased by some State, it would in the ordinary course of things have been brought to public auction, and it might have been sold under the same conditions as were two well-known collections of late years. In that case the British Museum would have sent an envoy thoroughly acquainted with the subject to the sale, with authority to expend a certain sum in making purchases for the Museum. It was accordingly contemplated that Mr. Newton, who is a gentleman most distinguished in this peculiar class of knowledge, should be directed to attend the sale, in order to purchase the most beautiful portions of the collection for this nation. The Government, however, found that if Mr. Newton were sent to attend the public sale we should have been called upon to give him a credit to the extent of at least £30,000; and it became us to consider whether it would not be wiser, instead of spending this large sum upon particular objects and portions of the collection, by a further expenditure to secure the whole. Mr. Newton went over to France, and examined the whole collection with a knowledge and a taste upon which we have thorough dependence; and he having made his report to the Government, we had reason to believe that it would be of the greatest advantage and benefit to this country, as well as for its honour, that it should acquire these treasures. Under these circumstances, we had to consider whether we should authorize Mr. Newton to purchase the whole collection. I will not venture—and perhaps it might be imprudent—to mention the amount that Mr. Newton was authorized by Government to offer; but I may say that that gentleman, acting under our instructions, made an offer of £45,000 for the purchase of the whole collection. That offer was refused; but I am glad to say that in the course of twenty-four hours after it was made the purchase was concluded on behalf of the country for £48,000. We have, however, reserved to ourselves the right of selling those portions of the collection, of which the British Museum possesses admirable duplicate specimens, and by this means we reduce the total sum paid by £2,221. The whole sum, therefore, that appears in the Estimates which I am now going to move, as having been expended upon the purchase of the Blacas Collection, is £45,721. I will now detail to the House with brevity the principal objects which we have obtained by this purchase. In the first place, we have gained one of the finest collections—probably the finest private collection—of gems in the world. It comprises 900 specimens, many of which are of the most exquisite description. These are now added to the British Museum, which before possessed but few works of art of this description and scarcely any of great importance. The British Museum also, which until the time of this purchase may be said to have been without a single cameo, now possesses the finest in the world—namely, that of the head of the Emperor Augustus, a cameo which has a European reputation, and which was purchased among others by the Duke de Blacas from the unrivalled Strozzi Collection, the beauties of which have been made known to the world by the most celebrated engravers. Hon. Gentlemen are, doubtless, aware that it is a most hazardous experiment to purchase gems whose history is not well known, and therefore the value attached to a well-authenticated gem is very considerable. Besides these magnificent gems we have obtained some of the finest Roman coins that, in all probability, were ever comprised in an individual collection. It so happens that the British Museum, although deficient in gems, is peculiarily rich in Roman coins; but some rare examples were wanting, and these the Blacas Collection will supply:—moreover, we have secured by the purchase several very rare and some unique specimens, and we may now say that our national collection of Roman coins and medals is the finest in the world. Besides these gems, coins, and medals, we have secured a very numerous and particularly rare collection of fictile vases. In these latter works of art the British Museum was already rich, and especially with relation to the early Greek period; but it was deficient with regard to the later period, when art flourished in its greatest luxuriance in Magna Græcia, and we have now been enabled to add 500 specimens of this latter age to our collection. I should perhaps not trouble the Committee further than to touch upon these three great divisions of gems, coins, and vases contained in the collection, which give an idea of its riches, but, by no means, the whole of its treasures. It contains one magnificent perfect specimen of sculpture in the head of Æsculapius of the period of Praxiteles and Lysippus, the very highest age of Grecian art, which will rank among the finest specimens of that great school. It might, perhaps, not be uninteresting to the Committee were I to point out one article in the collection which is so unique that there is nothing in Rome itself that approaches it. It was discovered in the Esquiline Mount in Rome in 1793. It is a copper casket of considerable size ornamented with silver, and holds the entire toilette service in solid silver of a Roman lady—the whole being in a perfect state—and thus giving us a very curious illustration, not only of the manners, but also of the art of chasing of that period. There are many other heads under which this great and rare collection might be divided. It would, however, be impertinent in me on an occasion like this to trouble the Committee further; but I believe from all that has reached me that this purchase has been made under fortunate circumstances, and that this country has acquired this celebrated collection upon terms which it never will regret. I may add that more than one State in Europe has been greatly disappointed at its being secured for the national collection of England. I trust that the Committee will allow me to move that the sum of £45,721 be voted for the purpose of defraying the cost of purchasing this collection, and that they will sanction the expenditure which the Government admit to be exceptional, but which, under the circumstances, they felt it to be their duty to incur.

MR. GLADSTONE: Had the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman required a Secunder, I should readily have undertaken that office. I do not mean to say that I have the knowledge or the experience in this particular matter which would in any way enable me to judge as to the precise relation between the value of the collection and the sum paid for it; but, having no reason to doubt that the right hon. Gentleman has well examined that question, I have not the slightest reason to believe that the state of the case is other than he has represented it to be. The right hon. Gentleman is himself aware that it would have been far more desirable had that course been possible for him to have submitted this Estimate in the regular course to this House previously to the purchase of this collection. He admits that he has undertaken a special responsibility in authorizing the expenditure of so large a sum without the sanction of Parliament. I wish, therefore, to release him from that responsibility as far as an individual Member of this House can do so. We have certainly arrived at a time when it becomes a very serious question whether we should grudge a sum of money for the purchase of rare articles such as those contained in this collection at a price not in excess of that which usage warrants. Now, I own that I do not see how the wealth of the country can be beneficially employed if not in the acquisition of treasures of this nature, which are themselves not only a perpetual and unfailing source of delight to multitudes of cultivated persons, but which are likewise a most powerful instrument of practical education for the people. If any Gentleman sit within these walls who yet require to be convinced, or, I will presume to say, enlightened, on that subject, I would humbly take the liberty to refer them to the masterly address delivered within the last fortnight by a Member of this House (Mr. Stuart Mill) to the students of the University of St. Andrew. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster on this public occasion for the singular felicity and power with which he has illustrated, with the weight of his own great authority, this practical and most important subject. There is one point on which I have a few words to say—namely, in regard to the question of Supplemental Estimates; but I do not like to mix that up in the present Vote, because it is a point which stands on its own ground, and therefore I will reserve it till we come to the next Vote. For the present, taking it, it is true, on trust to a great extent, but fully believing that the right hon. Gentleman has been quite justified in the course he has taken, I sincerely congratulate him on having been the means of obtaining for the country this most valuable acquisition.

MR. GREGORY thought that few persons would censure the Vote now proposed, for the press, as well as every person who had spoken to him on the subject, had with one accord approved most heartily of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government. Indeed, if we were to have a great collection and to spend large sums of money on works of art, nothing could be so injudicious as to lose, for the sake of a few hundred pounds, opportunities which might never again present themselves. In the course of his experience in the House of Commons he had never known any serious objection made to any special Vote like the present. Private individuals abroad had great wealth, and they knew what rivalry there was on the Continent among Emperors and Kings to secure these treasures of art, so that the obtaining of these works of art was a very difficult task. Therefore, a rich country like England ought not to scruple to purchase a great collection like this when it came into the market. He wished, however, to make one other observation. Could anything be more hopeless or lamentable than the condition of the British Museum? The greater portion of the works of art in the collection which formed the subject of this Vote would, he feared, be stored up, so that the public generally would not have a chance of seeing them. This would be owing to the want of proper accommodation, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, as soon as he was relieved from the present pressure of politics, propose to the House some scheme for the better arrangement of the British Museum, so as to make its treasures available to the public. He, for one, would do all that lay in his power to assist the right hon. Gentleman in carrying out that object; because he felt that the vacillation, the want of system which prevailed in regard to that great national establishment rendered it a reproach to the country.

(2.) £165,309, Royal Palaces.

Mr. CHILDERS said, it would be convenient if he took that opportunity of calling the attention of the House and that of his hon. Friend opposite to the construction of this Estimate, which he believed was almost without precedent. He did not think that hitherto it had been the custom of the House to vote at the commencement of a Session sums similar to that proposed in this Vote, in aid of Votes made in the early part of the financial year—at all events, it had not been the custom for the last few years. He had referred especially to the Estimates of last year to see under what circumstances the Supplementary Estimates had then been asked for, and he found that no Supplementary Vote had been taken on account of the Civil Estimates for the then current year, but that certain excesses on the Votes of the previous year, 1864-5, had been provided for. This was necessary, because till that time the previous practice in voting the Civil Service Estimates had been different from that which was observed in voting the Army and Navy Estimates; for, whereas the latter Estimates were given in respect of sums which came in course of payment during the year, the Civil Service Estimates were merely in respect of sums required for the service of the year. Two years ago that practice was altered, and it became necessary to wind up the old accounts. Consequently, last year, the Treasury brought in a Supplementary Estimate, not for the service of the year 1865-6, but for the service of the year 1864-5, so that the balances of certain accounts for the year 1864-5 might be closed. The Government then proposed the Estimates for 1866-7—the current year—and in them such provision as was necessary was introduced to make good anticipated deficiencies on the payments for the expiring year 1865-6. It was not usual at the commencement of a Session to vote any excesses on the existing year. All that it was usual to do was to vote any actually ascertained excesses in the Estimates of the preceding year, and to include in the Estimates of the following year any sums which it was thought would be required to make good advances for the current year out of the Civil Contingencies. The sum required last year was rather excessive, because of the change in the method, and he thought the Supplementary Estimates were between £200,000 and £300,000. That Vote passed without any objection being made. This year a new process had been introduced by his hon. Friend, who proposed that the House should vote in February certain sums for certain excesses anticipated on the Votes, not of the past, but of the current year. Indeed, it was proposed that excesses on individual items should be voted. The paper did not tell the House merely that the Vote No. 1, or No. 2, or No. 3 would be exceeded, but that certain items in those Votes would be exceeded; and his hon. Friend asked them to include all these individual items of excess in a fresh Estimate, to be accumulated upon the Estimates for the current year. He thought his hon. Friend ought to explain to the House why he had adopted this novel course, which might be attended with inconvenient results. If the House did not know whether the aggregate Vote was in excess, they might, perhaps, vote an additional sum, after all not really required, but which would tend to disturb the calculations on which the total expenditure of the Civil Services had always been based. Thus money would be unnecessarily placed at the disposal of Government which might be applied to other parts of the Vote, not mentioned on the face of the Supplementary Estimate. Besides, the tendency of trusting to a Supplementary Estimate on an ensuing Session would be to induce laxity in dealing with the original Estimate. As the Government was introducing a new practice, they ought to give good reasons for doing so before it was endorsed by Parliament. It had of course been anticipated that it would be necessary to supplement some Votes, and also to meet claims which had not been provided for; but this possibility was expressly contemplated by the Civil Contingencies Fund, the capital of which was £130,000. If the Government, instead of falling back upon this fund, was at the beginning of a Session to recoup itself by a Supplemental Estimate, it would be necessary for Parliament to consider whether the Civil Contingencies Fund was not too large for Government to have it at its disposal.

Mr. HUNT said, that the sums which were provided for in this Supplementary Estimate would, no doubt, under ordinary circumstances, have been paid out of the Civil Contingencies Fund; but it must be remembered that quite a new system of audit had been introduced, and it was therefore thought better, in this transition period, to clear the account entirely of sums that might have been recouped from the Civil Contingencies Fund, so that a fair start could be made with the new system. It was on that account that the Estimates were proposed in this form, and the explanation, he hoped, would be satisfactory. The first item in the Estimates was the re-voting of a portion of a sum of £1,780, which was included in the Estimates for 1864-5, and the item was therefore placed in the Estimates in accordance with the usual practice.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was glad to learn, from the statement which had just been made by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, that that Vote had been submitted to them under peculiar circumstances, and that it was not to be repeated. He would not take upon himself to decide upon the sufficiency of the reason assigned by the hon. Gentleman for the adoption in that instance of so exceptional a course, and he felt that it was the less necessary he should make such an attempt, inasmuch as the matter was not one of any great importance. But he confessed that he felt strongly in reference to the general question of Supplementary Estimates. He was persuaded that if any party or any Government wished to undermine the Constitution of this country, and the control of Parliament over the public finances, they could adopt no more effectual method for the attainment of that object than the presentation of Supplemental Estimates, which would necessarily prevent the House from exercising any real check over the national expenditure. The power of Parliament depended on its permitting no deviation from the principle of one Estimate of expenditure and one Estimate of revenue, except under very grave and exceptional circumstances. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury seemed by his cheers to assent to that enunciation of opinion, and he (Mr. Gladstone) thought that it would, therefore, be unnecessary for him to state the grounds on which he had been led to that conclusion; but he should repeat that he regarded that question of Supplementary Estimates as one which deserved the anxious and vigilant consideration of Parliament.

MR. GILPIN did not know that he should object individually to these Votes; but he did object to the Committee being called upon to vote upon all sorts of questions in a way that he never before, during his Parliamentary experience, recollected them to have been. He did not think they should be called upon to vote £165,000 in that offhand way. He thought it was due to the House that they should have an opportunity of discussing these Votes in detail. He trusted that the course now taken would not form a precedent for the future.

COLONEL SYKES said, he could not conceive why many of those items of expenditure, such, for instance, as the charge for the Royal Parks, should not have been foreseen; and the fact that those Supplemental Estimates were brought forward must, in his opinion, be held to be discreditable to the sagacity of the heads of the different Departments.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU wished that the Secretary to the Treasury would explain his former explanation. It was not enough to say that the matter should not be drawn into a precedent, for that would not prevent it. A method of proceeding had been established by the House for such cases. A Civil Contingency Fund had been instituted; it was that fund which should have been drawn upon for the expenses in question, and then a sum would be voted in 1867-8 to make up the deficiency.

MR. WYLD said, there were two points on which he was anxious to receive any information which the Government could supply. He wished, in the first place, to know whether it was the intention of the Government to entrust the execution of the new National Gallery to the architect who might be held to have produced the best design? He further desired to be informed whether intelligence has been received from Mr. Rassam to the effect that the Emperor of Abyssinia regards this as a political question, and will not release the prisoners unless he receives diplomatic communications from the Government?

MR. E. C. EGERTON, in reply to the last Question, said, that no intelligence had been received by the Government with respect to Mr. Rassam and the Abyssinian captives since the 12th of December; and he regretted to have to add that, according to that account, they were still in chains, although they were in good health and in good spirits as regarded their future prospects. The third item of £4,500 was for the expense of a body of artisans who had been sent out, and who were furnished with an autograph letter from the Queen. They had been unable to reach the Emperor Theodore, in consequence of a rebellion in his dominions. They were therefore still at Aden, and Colonel Merewether had instructed them to remain there until the captives had been released.

MR. OSBORNE said, he looked upon that Vote as a sort of olla podrida such as he had never before seen brought before Parliament; and many of the items seemed to him to require explanation. There was, for instance, a sum of £1,575 to be paid to Messrs. Banks and Barry for a design which they had been commissioned to make of a National Gallery on the site of Burlington House. He was quite aware that the noble Lord opposite was in no respect responsible for that sum. He would like to see the late First Commissioner in the House to explain why Messrs. Banks and Barry were originally to receive £5,000 for preparing designs for which that House had never given any authority. He was also struck by a Vote of £3,372 for the railing at Hyde Park; but he supposed that was the cost of the meeting which it was proposed should be held in the Park last summer. Then there was a sum of £1,300 for the expenses of the marriage of the Princess Helena, and immediately after that a sum of £65,000 for the cattle plague. Another item, which he saw with surprise and disapprobation, was an additional payment of £600 to be made to Mr. Cope for repairing the frescoes in the Houses of Parliament. He had always resisted the abominable uses to which the walls of these Houses had been put with respect to frescoes. The frescoes were dropping off the walls for shame. Had Parliament ever given its sanction to such additional remuneration? They were told that the Fine Arts Commission recommended that this sum should be given for the follies perpetrated on these walls. So long as the House of Commons consented so long would the Fine Arts Commission go on indulging their taste, and then call on the House to pay. If he could get any hon. Gentlemen, beside the leader of the forlorn hope, his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes), if he could get any respectable body of men, even thirteen, the number of the Reform Resolutions, he would go to a division.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the Burlington House design for the National Gallery had been prepared in 1859 when his predecessor was in office. When Messrs.

Banks and Barry sent in their bill it was for a sum of £5,007; but they consented to reduce the amount very largely, on condition that they should be appointed architects for the new buildings on the same site. What had in reality been done was this—the country had been saved £3,000 by the Vote which the Committee was now asked to sanction. He was not responsible for the plan of 1859. The hon. Gentleman opposite had very naturally alluded to the cost of the riot in Hyde Park; but he (Lord John Manners) could not help being a little amused at the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen, who seemed to be of opinion that it was the business of the Government to be prepared for everything beforehand, and that therefore it was the duty of the Department charged with the superintendence of the Royal Parks to have foreseen every charge that might arise in the course of the financial year. He did not think that his predecessor was fairly chargeable with having made no provision for this exceptional case. The money had been expended in replacing in a temporary manner the railings pulled down. It was perfectly obvious that it was a proper charge, and it was impossible to make any provision for it at the time. With respect to the frescoes in the Houses of Parliament, he (Lord John Manners) had to observe that the hon. Member for Nottingham was mistaken in supposing that they were repaired by Mr. Cope under the authority of the Fine Arts Commission. The fact was that that Commission had been abolished some time since; but in consequence of some remarks made in that House a year or two ago, a Commission had been appointed to inquire into the claims of certain artists who had been engaged in executing the frescoes; and it was in conformity with the Report of that Commission that it was proposed to pay to Mr. Cope that additional sum of £600.

MR. CHILDERS said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) had not explained the first item of £212 for Royal Palaces. There was a distinct item in the original Vote for 1866-7 for the repairs of the Royal Palace of Windsor; and if it had been found the sum was not sufficient this year the difference might, with the consent of the Treasury, have been made up out of the other items of the same Vote. It is nowhere stated that the total Vote will be insufficient. While addressing the House, he wished to ask a question with regard to the enormous Vote of £50,000 proposed for the French Exhibition. The year before last a small Vote—£5,000, he believed—was taken for this purpose, of which only £800 was spent. Last year £12,000 was voted for the service of the present year, and the Treasury was informed at the time that the sum would be sufficient for the expenditure connected with the French Exhibition in 1866-7. The entire Vote for the former Exhibition was £50,000, and of this only £41,000 was spent; but the Secretary of the Treasury now proposed to spend up to the end of March next not less than £62,000, even before the Exhibition was opened. It might be that the requirements of the French Government had necessitated so large an expenditure; but in the absence of any explanation it appeared monstrous. He also wanted to know whether the Royal Commissioners, who had the management of everything relating to the English exhibitors, had anticipated this expenditure; and, if so, when they had brought it under the notice of Her Majesty's Government and of the Treasury? If they had not anticipated it, the House had a right to ask what precautions they took in their arrangements with the French authorities as to the sum we were to be liable for. He need hardly remark that a considerable additional sum would probably be required for the following year. He hoped that those Members of the Government who were upon the Commission would show that proper precautions had been taken against what he feared would end in enormous expenditure.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished it to be understood that the great body of the Royal Commissioners had no control over the expenditure which had been incurred, a cut-and-dried schedule being merely submitted to them by the Executive when they met. No one was more astonished than himself at so enormous an outlay.

MR. HUNT said, that when the recent change of Government took place Her Majesty's present Advisers were astonished to hear of the large sum of money that would be required for the French Exhibition. The Government directed their immediate attention to the matter, and made every effort to keep the expenses in check, but they were told that a great part of the money to be asked for was already incurred; that under arrangements made with the Commissioners contracts had been entered into for the execution of certain works, and that it was, consequently, impossible seriously to reduce the expenditure. With the view of giving some explanation of why so large a sum was required, he must state some figures on the authority of a paper issued by the Science and Art Department. The space occupied by the United Kingdom and the colonies in the Exhibition of 1855 was 183,000 square feet, and in 1867 it was 360,000. In 1855 the sum voted by Parliament was £50,000, of which only £40,000 was expended, or something like 4s. 6d. per square foot. Under precisely similar circumstances that would make the expenditure for the present Exhibition upwards of £80,000. In 1855 the expense of flooring, decorations, counters, blinds, and other fittings, and nearly the whole staff for cleaning, arranging, and watching, were paid by the French authorities. This year all these things, with the exception of the flooring, blinds, and Fine Art decorations, had to be provided by this country; besides that, additional expense had to be incurred for the erection of supplemental buildings in the park, for agricultural and horticultural exhibitions, for machinery, &c. In 1855, the War Department, the Admiralty, the Trinity House, the Post Office, the Treasury, and the Science and Art Department were but slightly, if at all represented; in 1867 they would all be fully represented. The total Estimate of the Paris Exhibition was £116,650, which included the whole of the money expended during the last three years. He believed that nearly the whole of the sum now asked for would be spent before the close of the financial year; and a part of it was already due. As he had explained, contracts had been entered into before the accession to office of the present Government, and virtually the matter connected with this expenditure had been beyond their control.

MR. CHILDERS asked whether the late Government had authorized any portion of the expenditure?

MR. HUNT did not intend to suggest that they had done so. The expenditure was no more chargeable to the present than to the late Administration. It was a matter for which hardly any responsibility rested upon any Government.

MR. GLADSTONE put it to the hon. Gentleman whether, under these circumstances, it would not be desirable to lay before the House the Correspondence which had taken place before pressing the Vote.

Mr. Childers

By suggesting the adoption of such a course he did not wish to cast the slightest imputation upon the Treasury, or to repudiate any share which the late Government might have had in the transaction. He thought, judging from the feeling of the House, that they should be put in possession of documents to show how this charge of £62,000 had arisen, because it was a thing not to be tolerated that extraneous bodies should dispose of the public money. He was sure the hon. Member the Secretary for the Treasury would not misunderstand him when he asked that the Correspondence upon the subject should be laid upon the table.

Mr. AYRTON said, this Vote appeared to him to be a great exhibition of extravagance which it was necessary for the House seriously to consider. He submitted that the mode in which the Vote had been presented was a departure from the proper plan of submitting Votes to the House. He thought it had been clearly understood that no Votes should be submitted upon expenditure for a particular object unless the entire expenditure for the object was submitted to the House, and then the Vote was to be taken upon account. This was a very serious matter. They found that this Exhibition Commission had grown up without any sanction of the House, which was pledged to spend a sum exceeding £100,000. If this had been done at Kensington, it was of some consequence to know that there was at Kensington a fund out of which this could be paid. The expenses of our own Great Exhibition of 1862 could be defrayed without coming to this House, out of the estates in the hands of the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851; and it was a curious circumstance that they should now be called upon to pay so much towards the Exhibition at Paris. He was of opinion that to a large extent the expense of exhibiting the productions of this country should be borne by those who were to derive the benefit from the Exhibition. He hoped the House would not allow the Vote to pass without giving it its serious attention, and he trusted, for the reasons that had been advanced, that the hon. Member the Secretary for the Treasury would withdraw the Vote till the Correspondence was produced. He moved that the Vote be postponed.

Mr. CORRY assured the Committee that no one could be more surprised than the Lord President and he himself were when they first saw the amount of money that would be required for the British department of the Exhibition. At their first meeting at South Kensington Museum they were informed of the enormous cost which the carrying out of the requirements of the French Government would entail; but the question they had had to consider was whether they should do a very uncivil thing to France by withdrawing altogether from a participation in the Exhibition, or incur the necessary expenditure. The French Government had imposed charges on this and other countries which we did not ask foreign countries to pay on the occasion of our Great Exhibitions; but when they came to a comparison between the forthcoming Universal Exhibition and those which have preceded it—when they saw how much larger was the number of jurors who would be required, and how much greater the extent of space which this country had to fill, the amount did not appear so very large after all. Very heavy charges were thrown on us for a testing-house and other buildings in connection with war implements and working machinery. The engagements in connection with the French Exhibition had been entered into before the present Government came into office; but he and his Colleagues had cut down the expenses as much as possible. He had no objection to give the House every information in his power with respect to details.

COLONEL SYKES wished to know whether they were to understand that an allowance was to be given to the jurors?

Mr. CORRY replied that of course an allowance was to be given to jurors, as had been the case on previous occasions. The Committee did not imagine that gentlemen in business would go over to Paris and spend a couple of months there, examining articles, and making awards, and living at their own expense.

COLONEL SYKES had served as a juror at a former Exhibition and had not received a penny for his services.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE wished to know whether the foreign jurors had been paid at the Exhibition of 1862, because he had served as an English juror on the occasion and had not been paid?

Mr. CORRY said, he was not a Member of the Commission of 1862.

Mr. CARDWELL said, the sole question before the Committee was whether they were going to vote the money now, or whether they were to wait until the papers were laid before them. His own opinion was the latter course should be followed, so that they might learn upon what items the money was to be expended, and who was responsible for its expenditure.

MR. WATKIN said, that the question was whether the Committee would refuse to complete the work which had been commenced, and would intimate to the French that we would not carry out our promise to take part in their Exhibition. No blame for this expenditure rested upon the present Administration. The fault, if fault there was, was with the late Government, who appointed a Commission, the Members of which, not being business men, had, in their anxiety to promote the interests of England, demanded a great allowance of space, and great facilities for the exhibition of articles of English industry, without counting the cost. He should support the Vote.

MR. OSBORNE observed, that this was not a question of incivility to the French Government, but one of the responsibility of a large expenditure which Parliament had never voted. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) must not forget, in his desire to promote the Great Exhibition at Paris, that it was his duty, as a representative of the people, to look to the way in which the public money was voted. There was no charge made against the present Government in the matter. Every one knew that they had nothing to do with it. The Vice President of the Privy Council having cut the amount down as much as he could, now took the responsibility of it. He should like very much to know what it was when it first came under the observation of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues. This was one of the too frequent instances in which small beginnings grew into large Votes without Parliament knowing anything about what was going on until it was too late to object. The hon. Member for Stockport suggested that the Member for the Potteries and the other Commissioners were not men of business. Now, he suspected that "Science and Art" had stepped in, and that this was another of the South Kensington manœuvres. It was all very well to say, "Don't let us insult the French Government;" but Members of Parliament were bound to look after public money. He hoped the Committee would insist on having the details laid before the House, in order that they might be able to fix the responsibility in this affair.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the only point was on whom the responsibility was to be fixed. The House was entitled to the details making up the amount of £50,000 before they voted such a lump sum.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I should be very sorry that the question should be bandied about in this Committee as to the responsibility of any body for a proposition of this kind. The persons who are responsible are the Ministers. I myself do not shrink from that responsibility. Whether the late Government or some other persons have suggested the course which have led to these results is immaterial; but there can be no difficulty in deciding who are responsible. The Government would not have sanctioned such a Vote unless they had thought it desirable that it should be granted. When the credit and honour of the country are concerned, I trust it will never be a question as to who are the persons that should undertake responsibility in such a matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) complained that no details of the Vote are given, and with the view of getting rid of the objection I will give the details. They are as follows:—For internal fittings, £16,000; supplementary buildings in the Park, £23,065; ancient and modern art, £11,050; exhibitions of Government departments, £11,490; management, watching, clearing, £14,755; house expenses, £17,190; jurors, £12,000; rating, £8,250; Royal Commissioners, £2,750; total, £116,650. I do not want the Committee to consider, in any course they may take, whether what they are doing will be pleasing or displeasing to the French Government. We ought to perform our duty; and, no doubt, we can do so without doing anything displeasing to the French Government. But I want the Committee to take a large view of the circumstances—not a petty, personal, or prejudiced one. These great Exhibitions of universal interest are periodical. Expenses such as this have not to be often incurred. There is no doubt, therefore, that when it was determined that England should be represented in this Great Exhibition intended to be held at Paris, those responsible for the management did not consider that it would lead to an expenditure of such magnitude. There can be no doubt about that. But it is a great mistake to suppose that we find ourselves embarked in this expenditure because matters have been managed by persons who have been described as not men of business. On the contrary, those who had from the beginning the management of affairs—and as they are gentlemen not connected with me in politics I am speaking impartially on the subject—showed no deficiency of business-like attributes in all their arrangements and all their calculations; everything was planned and everything was foreseen, and many of these noblemen and gentlemen undertook their duty with the advantage of information based upon previous experience and experiments in those matters. The French Government, however, thought fit, after a due consideration of all the circumstances, to change the conditions which hitherto have been observed in all public Exhibitions of this kind. I do not for a moment think of questioning the propriety of their conduct, but that is really the cause of the increased expenditure. And what has happened? Those responsible for the Government of the country, whether those were our predecessors or ourselves, had to consider this simple question. The French Government having, in the exercise of their discretion, changed all the conditions hitherto observed in these Exhibitions, and by that change entailed on this country a considerable expenditure, shall we refrain from giving to the industry of our country that opportunity of showing its ingenuity and its varied powers which it expects at the hands of the Government? That is really the question. I dare say there are other States and countries that may also have been—I will not say annoyed, but may have been astonished at the change that the French Government has thought fit to make. But let us understand this. Every other country, however dissatisfied, or at least disappointed, by the course which the French Government has taken, has agreed to the altered conditions. Their industry will be represented, their ingenuity and acquaintance with the arts will be known to all the world, and the satisfaction and reputation which arise from such representation will be enjoyed by those respective States and countries. Well, would you be content in such a position that we should withdraw from the Exhibition? You know you would not. If we came down and told you, not that £50,000, nor £150,000, but that £200,000 were essential to the proper representation of this country, would you be satisfied at our withdrawal? The right hon. Gentleman says he must move for papers. I will candidly avow that there are no papers of the slightest importance. There is not a single line upon the subject, as I have just learnt by inquiry from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. No doubt there has been a great deal of bustling second-rate communication between individuals, but nothing that would throw any light upon or affect the main question. That question is simply what I have put before you. There has been no want of intelligence, no want of experience, no want of business-like habits, on the part of those—some of them filling the highest position in society—who undertook these offices; they did their duty thoroughly and perfectly and in a workmanlike manner. But the French Government changed their conditions, and the change has entailed great expense on every exhibiting country. No one is more annoyed than the Chancellor of the Exchequer at any increased expenditure; but, because of that expenditure, would you wish those who sit on these Benches to deprive England of the opportunity of exhibiting the products of her inventive genius by the side of other countries? You know you would not. You would think that in doing so we had taken up a mean position; a position degrading to the honour and to the highest interests of the country. I therefore trust the Committee will take a large view of the circumstances of this case—which I admit to be unsatisfactory—and will put on them the construction which they deserve, will assent to this proposition, will sanction this Vote of £50,000, and will feel that, in taking that course, they are acting in the manner most conducive to the advantage and the honour of the country.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman towards the close of his remarks admitted that the position of this affair is not satisfactory, and he also told us that he had not in his possession any papers which could throw light on the question. Under these circumstances, I confess I do not see that there would be any object in pressing for a postponement of the Vote; especially as the unsatisfactory circumstances which he confesses are to a certain extent covered by the admissions which he freely made. It is impossible, however, for me to pass over in silence the speech of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) He, forsooth, deals very easily with this matter, and shows immense anxiety to promote this French Exhibition. But that is not the question at all. Nobody shows any want of anxiety to promote the French Exhibition. I should hope we all come up to the standard of my hon. Friend in that respect. The question is whether engagements of this kind, involving matters strictly in the jurisdiction of this House, and of no one else, ought to be made apart from the responsibility of the Executive Government. My hon. Friend thought the late Government were responsible for this expenditure. My answer is, if the late Government be responsible, let any act of theirs be brought forward and put before the House; but when I ask my hon. Friend to do this he cries out against delay. My own mind is a perfect blank as to what has occurred prior to my leaving office, or what state of maturity the matter had attained at that period; but, substantially, this great charge has grown out of the change in the proceedings of the late Government; and after the frank statement made by the right hon. Gentleman as to the position of the House with regard to this Vote, I, for one, accede to the proposal of the Government. But before the regular Estimates of the year are brought forward I hope the necessary information will be afforded, so that when the Committee is asked for the large residue, as I am afraid it will be, of the Vote, they may see distinctly, and in a written form, what is to be the precise position of the House with respect to it.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK wished the House to revert to the question really before it—namely, the jumbling together in one lot a mass of heterogeneous matters. He trusted that such a jumble would not be presented to the House again.

MR. OSBORNE hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At the same time, he trusted some assurance would be given that the expenditure under this head would not exceed the limit of £116,000.

MR. AYRTON then withdrew his Amendment.

MR. WATKIN observed, that he had not said the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) was responsible for expending the money, but for appointing the Commission which caused the expenditure. Technically, the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was accurate; but the French Government changed the original conditions because of the unexpected and enormous demands for space by the foreign Commissioners, among others by our own representatives. The original cause of the heavy expenditure, he repeated, was the appointment by the late Government of Commissioners who were not men of business.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £101,300, Anglo-Chinese Flotilla.

COLONEL SYKES asked for some explanation of this Vote.

MR. HUNT said, that in the year 1865 an arrangement was made with the Chinese Government that if they would not sell the Anglo-Chinese flotilla they should be compensated for any loss they might sustain. It was thought that if they were obtained by either of the belligerent parties in America Imperial interests might be prejudiced. The value put upon the flotilla when it left China for England was £152,500, and the value for which it had been sold was £51,350. The ships were all either sold or contracted to be sold but one, and if that were sold the money would be paid to the Exchequer.

COLONEL SYKES denounced the sending out of these vessels for the purpose of service in China under the command of an English naval officer. Captain Sherard Osborn was put at the head of the expedition; but, unfortunately, a misunderstanding took place when he arrived in China. He found that he was not to be in the service of the Emperor of China, but in the service of the Governor of Shanghai. He very properly declined to accept the pay of a Governor of a province, and threw up his commission. The people of this country were now saddled with this Vote of £101,300, as the expense occasioned by our Government intermeddling between the Emperor of China and the Taepings. The head and front of the whole matter had been Mr. Horatio Nelson May, and now that gentleman, in a letter recently published, acknowledged the whole action of the British Government in interfering between the Chinese dynasty and its subjects the Taepings to have been an error. The result was that the British taxpayers had to pay £101,000 on account of these gunboats. He felt bound to protest against it, and moved the omission of the Vote.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. BAXTER said, it was too late to object to the Vote, but he earnestly hoped it would be the last of the kind that would ever appear in the Estimates. We had virtually interfered with a great civil war in China, and by so doing had committed a great blunder. The British taxpayers were now called upon to pay in respect of a fleet with which they had no concern. He trusted the noble Lord now at the head of the Foreign Office would take care that the policy of his predecessors in this respect would not again be adopted.

TRADES UNIONS BILL.—[BILL 18.]

(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners, Sir Stafford Northcote.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Walpole.)

MR. POWELL said, he could not help regarding the introduction of that measure, and the circumstances connected with it, as a herald and an omen of better times with respect to the relations between the work-people and their employers. The desire which existed among all classes, both of workmen and employers, for a full and searching investigation, might, he thought, be taken to imply a willingness on their part to submit to any consequence which might be fairly and reasonably deduced from that investigation. The existence of these combinations among working people, the great power they possessed, and the outrages supposed, whether rightly or wrongly, to have connection with them, rendered it highly important that a Commission should be issued for the purpose of procuring a searching inquiry into the nature of these associations. He did not wish to refer to the special cases that had led to this investigation. To the Royal Commissioners, who had been well and wisely selected, the details of the inquiry ought to be referred without prejudice. Any discussion on the subject that night must be very imperfect, and might, perhaps, tend to excite instead of to assuage irritation among the different classes affected. He did not desire the proposed investigation into trade outrages at Sheffield or elsewhere to range over a very long period of time; but he thought that in lieu of restricting its scope to five years, it would be better to allow it to extend over the last ten years, or to adopt such other limit as the Secretary of State might sanction. If that alteration were made in the second clause of the Bill, satisfaction would be given to those persons in various towns who took the deepest interest in the condition of the work-people and in the operation of trades unions.

MR. WATKIN said, he thought that if the inquiry into alleged trade outrages were to be rigidly confined to what had happened no longer ago than five years back, it would, in many cases, be practically useless, because such a limitation would act as a bar to complete investigation. Again, the Bill proposed to indemnify from criminal proceedings witnesses making full disclosures as to these outrages, provided they were not themselves the actual perpetrators of them. Thus the instigators of these cowardly deeds would be screened from prosecution, while those who only acted as their instruments would be deterred from giving evidence before the Commissioners. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) would gravely consider whether the measure might not be amended on these two points before it went into Committee. Some of the constituents of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) felt very strongly on these heads; and unless some alteration were made respecting them, the Bill would be practically useless. It was also most important that the constitution of the Commission should be such as not only to give satisfaction to the employed, but likewise to inspire confidence in the minds of the employers. Strong pressure appeared to have been put upon the Government in order to get what were called "the working man's friends" put upon the Commission. Now, his own experience of "the working man's friend" was, he confessed, not of a very favourable character. Generally such a person had not himself been a working man nor an employer of labour for a profit; and the sympathy which he showed towards the working classes was remarkably cheap. There was not a strong flavour merely, but a strong infusion of "the working man's friend" element in the Commission, which Commission was to investigate one of the most important questions connected with the future prosperity of this country. Then as to the legal element. He did not quarrel with the appointment of ex-Chief Justice Erle as Chairman of the Commission ; because he was sure that if they searched all England through they would not find a fitter man, and perhaps his presidentship would neutralize the inefficiency of other parts of the Commission. But there were not fewer than five or six gentlemen connected with the law among the Commissioners, and two out of the six held offices under the Government. Now, he had always a wholesome fear of the legal profession ; but when he found that two out of the eleven Commissioners not only belonged to that profession, but were officers of the Government and in its pay, he felt, as an employer of labour, considerable qualms as to what would be the result upon the efficiency of the Commission. Out of the entire eleven Commissioners they had only one who was, properly speaking, an employer of labour. In one sense the Chairman of the Great Western Railway, who was to sit on the Commission, might be said to be an employer of labour, but they knew he had never employed labour at a profit. He did not mean that that hon. Gentleman had never profitably employed labour ; but that he did not come within the ordinary category of those who employed labourers at a profit. The only person of that description on the Commission was Mr. William Matthews, of Birmingham—certainly a gentleman of the highest capacity and influence—but a Commission on such a subject, with only one employer of labour upon it, could not be said to be fairly or efficiently constituted. The object he had in view was that the Commission should be efficient ; but he believed he was speaking the opinions of the great employers in the cotton, woollen, silk, iron, and pottery trades when he stated that a Commission so composed would not give satisfaction.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that he dissented from the view expressed by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin), that these investigations ought to be carried back not only for five but for ten years. It would be very interesting, no doubt, if they could obtain a history of strikes by such means during the last ten years ; but as that was not fairly within the scope of the inquiry to be conducted under the present Bill, he thought the Government acted rightly in fixing upon five years as the period to which they should restrict their inquiries, because it would be a strange thing to compel men to give evidence on oath of events that had happened ten years ago. He trusted that the Government would not accede to the suggestion that the principals who had been guilty of outrages, should, by giving evidence before the Commission, be able to screen themselves from the just punishment of their crimes. As to the composition of the Commission, the hon. Member (Mr. Watkin) had said there were too many working men's friends upon it. He himself would have preferred seeing a working man instead of a working man's friend upon it. But here was one of the consequences of the confusion between the representative and the judicial functions of the Commission. If the Commission were only judicial, then he would have upon it men of marked impartiality, who had as little as possible to do with the question at issue, and who would be quite free from all but that necessary bias so difficult to be overcome by gentlemen who, from mere education and the circumstances which had always surrounded them, could not do otherwise than have more sympathy with the employer than the employed. Of course, he did not mean to say that there would be any wilful misjudging ; but it was very difficult for men of that class to throw themselves into the position and to realize the views of working men. If, however, the Commission were to be representative, and information from the working man's point of view were wanted, then the presence of a working man upon the Commission would be very desirable. He desired especially to point out that the two questions to be inquired into by the Commission widely differed in their nature, and he hoped they would be kept distinct. The one was a question between workmen and workmen, and the other between workmen and employers ; the one a question of outrage, the other a question of strikes and lock-outs. Police laws would, perhaps, settle the question of intimidation between workman and workman, and the more stringent the laws could be made on this point, the better for the community and for the workmen themselves. But police laws could not be made to settle differences between employers and employed, and he questioned whether courts of arbitration would succeed either. He hoped the Commission might throw light on this part of the subject ; but he must be allowed to express a doubt whether any legislation could put a stop to the differences which periodically arise between those who buy and those who sell labour. It would certainly be useful to inquire how far combinations either of masters or workmen, respecting which they had heard much of late, affect the industry and prosperity of the country. They had been told that our commerce was jeopardized, and they had been recommended to look abroad to those foreign competitors, who they had been assured would rob England of, at least, the supremacy in trade which she has so long enjoyed. They had been especially referred to Belgium. But what did they see there? They found that the differences between employers and employed culminated in riots, which were suppressed by the military. This, they had been assured, was what we might expect trades unions would bring us to; but that was a wrong view of the matter. It appeared to him that through which Belgium was now going, England had passed through the stage. Whatever the failing of our workmen, and however defective their views respecting combinations, they had certainly passed the stage in which men openly set the laws at defiance and seek to gain their objects by force. France had been referred to as an example. The press of this country had generally given them intelligence of every strike which had taken place in England, great or small. But he had seen very little notice of a strike which so lately took place in France. In the chief coal district of France at the beginning of November last year the miners demanded three or four francs a week more wages, and stopped work on being refused. In consequence, the military were called out, and the soldiers prevented the miners from passing from place to place to induce others to join the strike. Then the Prefect issued a sentimental proclamation, calling the miners his children and telling them they were brave hearts and honest workmen, and worthy sons of France. Eventually, moved either by the display of military force, or by the eloquence of the Prefect, the miners returned to their work, but not without receiving the increased wages they had demanded. Such, then, was the course of strikes in those countries which were going to carry away England's commerce and undermine her prosperity! He was quite ready to admit that this was a dangerous and delicate subject, and it was one on which men were particularly liable to be misconstrued and misunderstood. But he would nevertheless express his belief that the evil influence of trades unions upon the prosperity of our trade had been greatly exaggerated by the press and on the platform. And if that influence had been thus exaggerated in order to alarm the middle classes, as possessors of political power, with regard to the views and objects of the class below, then, in his opinion, that heavy responsibility rested upon those who had been guilty of such exaggeration, of setting class against class. It was, in his opinion, no less a political offence to set the middle classes against the lower by the argument of alarm than to set the lower against the governing classes by the argument of abuse. He had no sympathy with trades unions himself; and, as a political economist, representing a mercantile community, he was bound to watch them with anxiety—nay, even with distrust. He did not, however, think it on that account fair to accept the statement that the commerce of the country was endangered by those organizations without the most thorough investigation. He was therefore glad that inquiry into the subject was to be instituted. The commerce of the country had a deep interest in this question; but they ought not to assert that the prosperity of their trade was in danger because there had been more strikes than usual in the last six months. He trusted the Commission would be able to remove the obstacles to agreement between masters and men. But he thought that the events they now witnessed would have a more powerful effect on workmen than the Report of any Royal Commission. When they found that doors ready made, windows, window-frames, and even locomotives, were imported from abroad—they would, he thought, see the foolishness of their persisting in their present course. If it were possible by legislative action to improve the relations between employers and employed, by all means let it be done. For himself, he very much doubted whether much could be accomplished by such agency. The best way to effect a change for the better was, he thought, to bring public opinion to bear on the question; and the more the discussion of these burning questions was removed from the committee-rooms of trades unions to a wider area and a more public assembly, the more likely was it to lead to a satisfactory solution.

MR. ROEBUCK: I think, Sir, the position I occupy in rising to address the House on this subject is a still more delicate one than that of the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, inasmuch as my name is on the list of the Commission. It so happens that I have been very much mixed up with this matter. I was in fact at its very inception; and, if the House will permit, I will state one or two circumstances which may tend to clear away much of the ambiguity by which it is surrounded, and to remove some difficulties from the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, which now, it seems to me, is not a little confused and obfuscated. In the course of last year a dispute arose between a particular workman in Sheffield and a body of workmen. Very soon after that man's house was blown up by gunpowder. One side of it was blown out, himself and his family escaping destruction by a miracle. This outrage excited great indignation in Sheffield. A committee was appointed for the purpose of discovering the perpetrators of it. Large rewards were offered with the same object, but without avail. The committee afterwards put themselves in communication with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Walpole), and asked him to permit them to wait upon him and lay their views on the matter before him. He assented to their request, and they asked myself and my hon. Colleague to introduce them. We did introduce them, and I thought the subject so delicate that I wrote down what I proposed to say to the right hon. Gentleman on paper. After reading it I handed to him the paper, in which it was clearly and positively stated that it was the feeling of the manufacturers of Sheffield that the outrage in question, as well as similar outrages in years past, had been suggested, suborned, and paid for by the trades unions. That was the distinct proposition laid down by the manufacturers. They told the right hon. Gentleman that they had offered large rewards to discover the perpetrators of the crime; that they had come up to London to ask him to issue a Commission for the purpose of making inquiry into the case; that the Commission must, to be effectual, be furnished with Parliamentary powers, and pointing out in what they thought those powers ought to consist. Very soon after, an account of this interview having been published, the working men of Sheffield addressed the right hon. Gentleman, asking permission to wait upon him, and—taking a course which, I must say, was I think complimentary to me as showing their belief in my impartiality—asked me to introduce them. I was accompanied also by my hon. Colleague on that occasion, and I wrote down as before what I intended to say. What was the statement of these men? They alleged that they had been falsely accused, and, in almost the very words used by the manufacturers, they asked for a full and searching inquiry into their whole conduct. So entirely innocent did they feel, they said, that they shrank from no investigation. They added, however, that they thought twenty years too long a period to go back; that many persons had within that time died; and that the inquiry would, as a consequence, be attended with considerable difficulty. I accordingly limited the time to ten years in the paper which the right hon. Gentleman has now in his possession. Shortly after this interview the manufacturers of Sheffield wrote to me, begging me to re-consider the subject of time, and stating that, in their opinion, twenty years was by no means too long a time. I did re-consider the matter. I again waited on the right hon. Gentleman, and told him the representations which the manufacturers had made to me, adding that I still adhered to the ten years. Thereupon, the right hon. Gentleman said he thought he could suggest a mode which would suit all parties. He believed, as I believed, that a Commission appointed by him would gain the confidence of both the working men and their employers, and that in the hands of its members might be safely left the question as to whether the inquiry should be enlarged. The right hon. Gentleman, in substance, said:—"We can give the Commission elastic powers, so that if they should see fit to carry the investigation back beyond ten years, they will be at liberty to do so on their own responsibility." So the matter stood; but we have this evening been treated to a fantastic dissertation as to the difference between an inquiry into the perpetration of an outrage and one into the principles of political economy. The whole thing, however, is as clear as sunlight as put by the manufacturers of Sheffield. They say that the inquiry should be instituted to discover the truth as to what has been the conduct of the men who are members of trades unions, and also as to how those societies have affected the trade of Sheffield. Talk as you like about the doctrines of political economy—on which I suppose my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) is the best authority to whom you could have recourse—but the real simple point to be inquired into is, have the offences alleged been committed, as suggested? The masters say they have; the workmen say they have not; and the Commission is appointed to decide between them. I am told there ought to be a working man upon it; but let me suppose that a butcher is accused of murder, do you think it necessary that there should be a butcher on the jury by whom he is tried? I would like to have had a Commission composed of three persons, having at the head of it the distinguished, and I might say revered, Judge already named, assisted by two grave, candid, and intelligent assessors. That would have been enough to have inquired into the political economy of the question. The thing is quite clear if we do not mystify it, and bring fantastic notions to bear upon it. It is no use attempting to frighten the working man, for he says he is not to be frightened, that he is innocent, and that he will prove his innocence if you afford him the opportunity of doing so. The Commission will give him leave, and all we ask is to have power to manage matters so as to bring out the truth. But how can we bring out that truth? All these outrages, say the masters, have been perpetrated by the same hand, and though that hand has been bought and instigated by persons behind the scenes, yet all these acts have been the deed of a single man, and the masters think that by giving impunity to that person we shall be able to get at the truth. I go one step further, and say if you give impunity, not only to the man who committed the deed, but also to the man who suggested it—for we do not aim at punishment—we are still more likely to learn the truth. We shall then arrive at what we want to learn. We do not want punishment or penal laws; what we want to learn is whether the trades unions of this country are so conducted that they tend to the damage of our trade and commerce. If you think that the men on the Commission are not honourable men, or if you think that they are unfit for the duty, by all means change them, for there are men in England quite sufficient and equal to the inquiry. Make a careful choice, but give the Commission power to make a full inquiry. This is a very serious matter, and one that ought not to be dealt with lightly. There are great interests concerned, and it becomes us to inquire into the matter impartially. As far as I am concerned, I would rather not be on the Commission; but, being on it, I will bring an impartial mind to bear upon the subject. I care neither for one side or the other. I am, however, firmly convinced that we shall not be able to make a full inquiry unless we are able to extend pardon to all who have been concerned.

MR. SAMUELSON said, that the hon. Member for Sheffield had asked whether, supposing a butcher was accused of murder, a butcher should be on the jury? He would put another question. Supposing there was an inquiry into the conduct of butchers and graziers, affecting the public, would it be desirable that the Commission of Inquiry should consist of graziers and consumers, without a single butcher? That was precisely the situation in which the workmen were placed with regard to the Commission, through what he must be permitted to call the precipitancy of the Home Secretary. He thought that if the right hon. Gentleman had taken the working men into his counsels he would hardly have made the omission. If the right hon. Gentleman were determined to inquire into the outrages at Sheffield, it would be the opinion not of the workmen of Sheffield only, but of the workmen of London and throughout the country, that no Commission could possibly give satisfaction to both the parties unless both were fully represented. Yet they had on this Commission two employers of labour, one of them at least an employer for profit. More than that, however respected those gentlemen might be as individuals, they were connected exactly with those branches of trade, the iron and coal trade and the engineering, that had been most disturbed by strikes. Yet there was not a single workman. He was aware that Mr. Harrison had been approved of by a deputation of working men that had waited upon the Home Secretary, headed by a gentleman with whom the right hon. Gentleman had had many interviews of late, Mr. George Potter; but he could not learn that the representatives of the trades unions, as a body, had ever been consulted as to the composition of the Commission. It was, perhaps, too late to alter that now; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would devise some plan by which working men might be more directly represented or might be present at the inquiry. With regard to the limitation of the Commission, he approved of its being confined to five years. If they wanted to go farther, and to have a history of trades unions, they ought also to inquire into the prior events which caused trades unions. It might suit the honour of the Sheffield workmen to extend this inquiry, but what good would it do to the country at large? He feared that if it went farther back the old grievances of the workmen, including the truck system, might crop up. To put down that system it had been necessary to have recourse to legislative measures of the most stringent character. Indeed, it would be found that in many, if not in all of the trades, where a feeling of hostility towards the masters prevailed at present, it might be traced to acts of oppression on the part of the masters at a former period. As to foreign legislation, he did not think they had much knowledge to get from abroad. The French workmen had not had the right to combine for increase of wages for more than two years, and their right of meeting was only one year old. The Tribunaux de Conciliation—Conseils des Prud'hommes as they were called—did not meet to settle strikes or combinations at all, but only to decide on questions arising out of agreements previously made between employers and employed. If any Council to arbitrate between the workmen and the masters were to be set up in this country, it had yet to be invented.

MR. WALPOLE: I think, Sir, I may divide the debate of this evening into two branches. One is a branch of the subject not strictly before us—namely, the constitution of the Commission, the position and terms upon which the Commission is to act, and the extent to which the inquiry is to go. The other, which is strictly before us, confines itself to the provisions of the Bill, in reference to which several suggestions have been made. Upon each of those suggestions I will offer a few remarks. Following the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) into that portion of his speech with regard to the composition of this Commission, I cannot but observe that when I see the manner in which different Gentlemen have spoken of this Commission, and that their opinions exactly balance each other, it seems to me that the impartiality which I wished to attain in this Commission has been fully accomplished. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) complains that on this Commission the masters will have no power. The hon. Member who has just sat down takes an entirely different view of the question, and complains that while there are masters on the Commission, the workmen are excluded. Now, it ought to be borne in mind that if any workmen were to be appointed on the Commission then you must have had a corresponding number of masters. The country would not have been satisfied unless you did that. But I believed it was better to do with regard to this Commission what is usually and wisely done in all Commissions of a judicial character—namely, that in such a case none of the parties who are directly concerned in the issue should be put upon the Commission; but that those men should be placed there who, without being directly concerned, take a deep interest in the subject, and are able to represent the views of the different parties. That, I believe, I have completely accomplished. It has been objected that there are two masters on the Commission—one of the gentlemen referred to is my hon. Friend the Member for Cricklade (Sir Daniel Gooch); but I am quite sure there is no man on the Commission or in this House who would more truly represent the workmen. The other is Mr. William Matthews; and I am equally sure there is no one who will inspire either master or workman with more satisfaction and confidence. Whom have we appointed on behalf of the workmen? Let it not be forgotten that I earnestly wished the ablest writer and philosopher on these subjects to allow his name to be placed on the Commission. I entreated the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) to act, that he might represent the political economy of the question, as well as the interests of the working men, and give both masters and workmen the benefit of his philosophy and experience. More than that, let it not be forgotten that we did appoint two persons who have given great attention to this subject—first the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Thomas Hughes), who is known to take the deepest interest in all that concerns the elevation of the working classes; and next a barrister, Mr. Frederic Harrison, who has written more ably on this subject, in favour of trades unions, than any other author I know of. If any Member in the House has read Mr. Harrison's works, he will know that I do not in the least exaggerate when I affirm, that there is no man who more fully, more completely, or more ably represents the views of the working classes than Mr. Harrison. With regard to the objection that employers and workmen are not properly represented on the Commission, I can only say that if I were engaged in any business or profession which was made the subject of inquiry, I would infinitely prefer that the persons selected to adjudicate on the matter should not be interested as parties, though of course I should wish them to be competent to judge of the whole case. With regard to the other members of the Commission, the hon. Member for Stockport complains that there are on it six lawyers and two officials. The hon. Member is wrong in both instances. There may be six members on the Commission who have been lawyers, but there are not two who are now in practice. So with regard to the officials he is also wrong. I presume the hon. Member refers to Mr. Herman Merivale and Mr. Booth. It is true the one gentleman is in the Colonial Office; the other was connected with the Board of Trade, and he was also a lawyer, but he has retired from both, and I venture to say you will find no men better fitted to manage this inquiry than they are. If you analyse this Commission, I believe you will find that it is composed of honourable and impartial men—that the views of the employers and the employed are fully represented; and I trust that, presided over as it will be by that able man (Sir William Erle) who is at its head, and in whose fairness every one has the most perfect confidence, I have no fear but that it will be conducted in the fairest and most impartial manner. With regard to one or two other points. The right hon. Member for the City (Mr. Goschen) on a former occasion criticized the terms of the Commission as if the whole affair was made to hang on the outrages at Sheffield. I felt the justice of that criticism; and I took advantage of the appointment of Mr. Harrison to cancel the first Commission, which had been signed and countersigned, and could not therefore be altered; and in the new Commission I have adopted words which I hope will meet the right hon. Gentleman's views. With regard to the limitation of the period of examination for five years, I may state that it was first intended to extend the inquiry to the last twenty years, and we afterwards limited it to ten. But, after all, our object is not so much to inquire for the purpose of detecting outrages, as to inquire how far those outrages are connected with trades unions. For this purpose I doubt whether it will be necessary to go more than five years back, or at any rate for more than ten years back. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) thinks we ought to have gone further. That is a point rather for the consideration of the Committee; and if the Committee should be of opinion that five years is not a sufficient period in which to trace out the connection, supposing it to exist, then power may be taken to go back for five years more. Another point was made by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, who complained that indemnity was not granted even to the actual perpetrators of these outrages. I confess that if these outrages had not been connected with the worst crime known to law—to that of murder—it might have been reasonable to extend the indemnity even to the actual perpetrators of the outrages. But I entertain grave doubts whether we ought to give a Parliamentary indemnity to persons who on inquiry may be found guilty of an attempt to murder. This, however, is a grave question, which ought not to be discussed on the second reading of the Bill; but it will be for the House to consider the subject fully and deliberately in Committee. I will only express my hope that I may draw from the observations made in the House—which I have heard with great satisfaction—an augury that much good will result from this inquiry, and that it will lead to a better state of feeling between masters and workmen. If that should be the result, I can only say there are few measures I have had the honour to submit to the House that will afford me in the retrospect more satisfaction than that Bill which is now, I trust, about to be read for a second time.

MR. HADFIELD said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would allow a little time to elapse before the Bill went into Committee. It had only been recently introduced, and it had taken some of the leading men of Sheffield by surprise. His constituents were of opinion that a longer period than five years was necessary in order to get at the facts; and also that it was absolutely necessary that the Commission should have the power of indemnifying principals who had been engaged in unlawful acts. When it was recollected that a reward of £1,000, supplemented by a reward of £100 by the Government, had not had the effect of detecting the persons who were engaged in the recent transactions at Sheffield, it showed how well the secret was kept, and that it would be impossible to arrive at the truth without some such power as he suggested was given to the Commissioners. He had been informed that evidence of a surprising character would be given if it were done. The inquiry was not for the purpose of convicting the perpetrators of heinous offences, but to ascertain what was the effect of trades unions on the commission of crime; and therefore it was that he pressed, at the request of his constituents, the latter point on the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. He concurred with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham (Mr. Samuelson), who was one of the largest employers of labour in Lancashire, that it would have given greater confidence if a workman had been appointed on the Commission. It was a hopeful sign of the times that the masters and men had joined in a petition to the Government for the appointment of this Commission.

MR. OSBORNE said, he very much regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had in his Bill mixed up two distinct questions—namely, the outrages that had been committed at Sheffield, and an inquiry into the operation of trades unions in other places, because he was inclined to think it would prejudice the Report that might be made to the House. He acknowledged the excellent disposition with which the right hon. Gentleman had met the question, and he deserved great credit for the open manner in which he had constituted the Commission. At the same time, he thought it would have been more desirable if the right hon. Gentleman had put a working man on the Commission; and he could not understand why a working man and a master had not been named on it. He had seen the advantage of this in the town he had the honour to represent. An hon. Gentleman sitting near him had said that no attempt had been made in England to constitute boards of conciliation and arbitration; but in Nottingham there had been a most successful instance of it. In Nottingham, which was the centre of the hosiery and glove trade, boards of conciliation and arbitration had worked most successfully. Up to 1860 strikes were very frequent in that district, and of the most dangerous description. It would be recollected that Luddism originated there, in striking against the introduction of improved machinery. There were a few strikes in 1860, and in the autumn of that year the masters and men met and formed boards of conciliation and arbitration, consisting at first of nine masters and nine men, but they were now composed of seven masters and seven men, and from 1860 down to the present time, although great distress in the trade had existed, there had not been a single strike or lock-out. The men elected the president, the masters the vice-president. The conciliation shown by the masters had been appreciated by the men, and the rate of wages was amicably discussed and settled. The truck system and the payment of wages on Saturday night—which caused great inconvenience through the markets being closed—had been abolished through their agency. That beneficial change was owing to the exertions of a gentleman who was at the head of the Nottingham trade. He pressed on the Government the propriety of the examination of the president and vice-president of these boards by the Royal Commissioners. He had been informed that most of the evils that had occurred to the trade and commerce of Nottingham were owing not so much to the effects of trades unions as to the ignorance that prevailed amongst the working classes, and the necessity there was of promoting some great system of national education. He had been told by a large manufacturer at Nottingham, who had also a large manufactory in Saxony, that he felt greater apprehension from the want of education than from the effect of trades unions. That gentleman employed 750 hands in Saxony, and although they worked for lower wages than his work-people obtained in this country, he felt humbled in being obliged to admit that their knowledge on all questions was superior to that of his English workmen. That gentleman also said that until they promoted education and dissipated ignorance there was greater danger to apprehend from the latter than from trades unions to the trade and commerce of the country. Much as it was the fashion to flatter the masters, and to run down trades unions, in consequence of the outrages that had been committed of late in one district, there was much to be said for them. If the working classes were met in a spirit of conciliation they, like other men, would not be insensible to it. He regretted that the two questions had been mixed up; but even as it was, he thought nothing but good could result from the inquiry.

LORD ELCHO said, he thought his right hon. Friend had performed a great public good by issuing this Commission, and he was able to state from personal observation that the working men were in favour of this inquiry. At the large meeting of workmen recently held in Scotland, he put it to them whether, in the event of an inquiry taking place, and it was shown that trades unions acted injuriously, they would abandon them so far as strikes were concerned, and accept the medium of courts of conciliation, and they replied they would. That, at any rate, showed good feeling on the part of the men. Only to-day he had received a letter expressing a hope, on behalf of 90,000 or 100,000 men, that this Bill might pass through Parliament as rapidly as possible. There was one point to which he wished to call the attention of his right hon. Friend. It did not affect the inquiry generally so much as the labour of the Commission. Having the honour to be a member of the Commission, along with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), he must refer to the second clause, the phraseology of which led to the conclusion that the inquiry could only take place at Sheffield. The Commission would be bound, unless they had the special permission of the Home Secretary, to sit permanently at Sheffield. He doubted whether even his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield would like that, and certainly the other members of the Commission were under the impression that the inquiry might be conducted in London.

MR. WALPOLE said, his attention had been called to this point. The second clause referred not to the general inquiry, but to the outrage at Sheffield, which would have to be inquired into on the spot.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE moved for leave to bring in a Bill for extending and regulating the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, and for conferring Admiralty jurisdiction on the County Courts. He said, he thought it would be better to postpone any discussion upon its nature and principle until the House had had an opportunity of examining it. He might, however, state that for some years there had been a great desire on the part of the various mercantile communities, more particularly at Liverpool, that local tribunals should be established, before which questions relating to shipping might be easily and speedily decided. Two years ago the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) with regard to England, and last year the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) with regard to Ireland, had endeavoured to obtain the sanction of Parliament to the establishment of local tribunals of this nature, and both propositions were supported by memorials and deputations to Government from the various mercantile communities of the country. They were not, however, proceeded with. Government had now decided to endeavour to meet these general wishes by bringing in a Bill by which it was proposed to establish courts of this description. In order that the proposed courts should be enabled to deal with questions of all kinds connected with shipping, it was desirable that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty should be extended. The Bill he proposed to introduce extended the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty to the necessary extent, and gave power to the County Courts, or to such County Courts as Her Majesty by Order in Council should name, to take cognizance of all causes relating to shipping where the amount involved did not exceed £500, or with the consent of parties to any amount, an appeal lying to the Court of Admiralty. It was thought better to give this jurisdiction to County Courts than to create new tribunals.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he could assure the House that the mercantile community would hear with the greatest satisfaction of the introduction of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for extending and regulating the Jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, and for conferring Admiralty Jurisdiction on the County Courts, ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, and Mr. CAYE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 28.]

TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS (IRELAND) BILL.

LAND IMPROVEMENT AND LEASING (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD NAAS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to promote the improvement of land by occupying tenants in Ireland. He said, in submitting some observations to the House upon this important question, he should take up the question as nearly as possible where it was left by the House last year. It would be idle to waste the time of the House in arguing upon the necessity or the advantage of legislating upon this subject. It was a matter for argument whether legislation at all was desirable, and very strong and cogent arguments had been adduced to show that the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland was a subject that might fairly be left to arrange itself under the ordinary law which regulated supply and demand. The House of Commons, however, had repeatedly affirmed a principle contrary to that doctrine, and he himself believed that there were circumstances in the condition of that country which rendered legislation on this question desirable if not necessary. The relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland before 1845 were but little spoken of as a political question. Agitation at that time was carried on with great violence, was conducted by men of great genius and intellect, who possessed almost unlimited sway over the feelings and affections of the Irish people. But in those times what is called the land question did not take a prominent position in the list of Irish wrongs, and the existing tenure of land was seldom, if ever, put forward by popular leaders as a substantial grievance. But in 1845 the Government thought that the relations between landlord and tenant were in a sufficiently unsatisfactory state to justify them in issuing an important inquiry, known as the Earl of Devon's Commission; ever since that Commission made their celebrated Report this subject had every year occupied more or less of attention of Parliament. Since that time he believed no fewer than twenty-five Bills had been introduced into that House on the subject. It was not his intention to raise again this dreary row of ghosts, or to weary the House with a description of the provisions contained in those abortive measures. It would suffice to mention that only one of them had become law—that which was introduced and passed through that House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell). How did it happen that legislation on this subject, though attempted on many occasions by men of great Parliamentary experience, knowledge, and talent, and also by men who, though not holding office, were well acquainted with the wants and wishes of the country, had resulted in so many conspicuous failures? He believed it was principally owing, not to any disposition on the part of the House to shrink from the question, but from the enormous difficulties inherent in it. While evils were admitted to exist, the remedy proposed always appeared to the House to be either wholly insufficient or to go so far as to interfere materially with what were considered to be the undoubted rights of property. With regard to the extremest measures which had been proposed elsewhere, they had seldom found their way to that House in the shape of a substantive proposition. Such extreme proposals had been generally confined to the platform, hustings, and pamphlets, and had seldom been submitted in detail to the consideration of Parliament. In attempting to legislate upon this subject the House must approach, and endeavour to deal with interests of a private nature, and matters most varied and complicated in their character. It was almost impossible to legislate fairly in regard to all the numerous interests which must come under the purview of any proposal on this subject. This was the more remarkable because of late years there had not been any great divergence of opinion as to the objects to be attained by legislation. It is alleged and generally agreed that it was a grievance that tenants in Ireland were in the habit of making improvements at their own expense; but that, in the event of their being evicted or leaving their farms before they had an opportunity of reaping the fruits of the money they had laid out, no machinery existed for providing adequate compensation. It is further alleged that this absence of security discouraged industry and rendered the land unproductive, that it bogot a feeling of carelessness and indifference, so that a lack of exertion existed among the peasantry of Ireland. That was generally, he believed, the substance of the view put forward by moderate politicians, and it was not very different from that of the Devon Commissioners as far back as 1845. The Commissioners said—

"In some instances the tenant may have capital which he will readily expend upon the land, if he can only be assured that he shall enjoy an adequate return for his expenditure in the length and certainty of his tenure, or can have secured to him a fair compensation for his outlay and labour on quitting the farm. On the other hand, it not unfrequently occurs that the only capital which the occupier of the soil possesses is to be found in the labour of himself and his family. If you show to him in what manner the application of that labour may be rendered most conducive to his own comfort and permanent benefit, and assist him with money or materials which his labour cannot supply, you will generally find the Irish peasant ready to co-operate with you in effecting improvements beneficial alike to himself and to the country. It is because we believe in the concurrent testimony of many witnesses, that the attainment of these desirable objects is impeded by the feelings of distrust and insecurity that too often prevail among the tenant class in Ireland, that we venture to recommend some legislative interference upon this point. Although it is certainly desirable that the fair remuneration to which a tenant is entitled for his outlay of capital or of labour, in permanent improvements, should be secured to him by voluntary agreement rather than by compulsion of law; yet, upon a review of all the evidence furnished to us upon the subject, we believe that some legislative measure will be found necessary in order to give efficacy to such agreements as well as to provide for those cases which cannot be settled by private agreement. We earnestly hope that the Legislature will be disposed to entertain a Bill of this nature, and to pass it into a law with as little delay as is consistent with a full discussion of its principle and details."

So, in reality, the reasons put forward by the Devon Commission twenty-one years ago varied but little from those advanced at the present time in favour of legislation on this subject. It appeared to him that the discussions which took place last year were characterized, as far as that House was concerned, by a far different spirit from that which formerly prevailed respecting this question. Though these discussions were few—he believed they only extended over one night and a half—they were distinguished by a spirit of moderation and an apparent desire to do something practical, such as had seldom or never been evinced before, the objections therefrom raised against the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite were not so much against the objects he had in view as against the machinery he suggested for attaining his end. In the present Bill he proposed to arrive at the same object as the right hon. Gentleman, but by a somewhat different road. He should endeavour to attain that object by a plan which should offer to the tenant the means of obtaining compensation for bond fide improvements of the land, without incurring the dangers of the proposal introduced last year. On the present occasion it was not his intention to enter into a discussion on the general state of Ireland. In that country, which was almost wholly agricultural, there was hardly any political or social question which was not in a greater or less degree mixed up with the land. On the present occasion, however, he should merely submit in the briefest possible way the provisions of the Bill which he was about to ask leave to introduce, although no doubt in the future

stages of the measure many questions would be discussed which though, perhaps, not comprised in its provisions were yet to a certain extent connected with it. He should now endeavour to avoid any question which might raise differences of opinion, least of all was it his intention to attack or find fault with the measures proposed in previous Sessions. A great number of those measures were proposed in the sincere desire to effect something towards a settlement of the question, and he believed the chief cause of their failure was the enormous difficulties inherent to the subject. In most of the moderate measures which were introduced the great defect was that it was proposed that the tenant should be obliged to serve a very elaborate notice on the landlord as to what improvements he proposed to make, and that notice was liable to be considered by the landlord in the shape of a hostile proceeding, and might be challenged item by item before an officer before the landlord's consent was given. The second defect, common to most of the Bills, was that when the claim which was made and had been established came to be settled a great and elaborate machinery of arbitrators, courts and Judges, assistant barristers, clerks of the peace, and so forth, was considered necessary in order to decide upon the value of the claim and the amount to be paid to the tenant. In fact, in many instances litigation was made not only possible, but probable in every case. Now, in the Bill which he proposed to submit there would be no elaborate machinery of that kind. In his Bill there was no trace of a Judge, clerk of the peace, arbitrator or umpire, while even the well-known form of the assistant barrister was conspicuous by its absence. He should propose as simple a machinery as possible, his great object being to avoid, both at the commencement and termination of each transaction, anything likely to lead to litigation. He proposed to found his Bill upon the principle of the Lands Improvement Acts, which had been in operation for many years, both in Great Britain and Ireland, and had been attended invariably with beneficial results. Perhaps no Acts had ever been passed by the Legislature that had worked more easily and beneficially. They had been tried under different forms in the various parts of the United Kingdom with invariable success. The principle of those Acts was that money lent to or expended by the owners under the provisions of the Acts should be charged upon the land without reference to title, so that the money being expended under certain restrictions and rules it became a charge on the land and the land only. If, for example, an owner borrowed money under the Lands Improvement Acts, and laid it out upon the land, even though it turned out the very next day that he was not the rightful owner and had no right to effect the loan, yet whoever the owner might be, the charge would attach itself to the land until the debt was entirely paid off. In England and Scotland the operation of this principle had been very extensive. Here the money was provided by financial companies, who undertook that duty, but the carrying out of the improvement was sanctioned by a public body. In Ireland, however, the money was provided by Government. The beneficial effects of the working of this principle in England and Scotland were illustrated by what had been done by one company. It had been in existence nearly twelve years; it had lent £2,300,000, every farthing of which had been expended upon permanent improvements in land; and the repayments had been as satisfactory as the advances had been large. The annual repayments of principal and interest had amounted to something like £128,000 a year, and the arrears at this moment were only £689, so that in England and Scotland there was absolute certainty of repayment of the money advanced. In Ireland the mode of proceeding was somewhat different, and, though it was well known, it would be convenient to remind the House what it was. The owner of land might apply to the Board of Works, by means of an easily obtained form, for a loan to be employed in making improvements specified by the Act. The form was precise, but it was not so minute that there was any difficulty in filling it up. It required the applicant to state the probable expense of the improvement, the estimated increase of value that would be conferred on the land, and the actual sum required. Upon receipt of the application a notice was published by the Commissioners of the Board of Works inviting objections, and, if no objection was made within a fortnight, inquiry was instituted. If that were satisfactory the money was granted, and the work was carried on under the superintendence of the Commissioners. No second instalment was paid until the Inspector certified that the first instalment had been fully and properly expended in the proposed improvements. The loan was made a first charge upon the land, repayable in twenty-two years, and last year an Act was passed extending the term to thirty-five years. As yet, the money had been advanced for the extended term only for buildings and improvements of an expensive character, but there was nothing in the law to prevent money being lent for the full term for any contemplated purpose. It was competent to the Commissioners to lend the money at 5 per cent, repayable in thirty-five years. At present they had not done this, but they had power to do so. The result of the working of these Acts—for there were three or four of them—was most satisfactory, and from the first the beneficial effects of the advances had been manifest. In the Eighteenth Report of the Board of Works, made in 1850, Sir Richard Griffiths said—

“The Irish agriculturist complains of low prices and deficient produce; let him drain and subsoil by the spade, and the return will be doubled, and frequently quadrupled. He is deficient in capital; a loan under the Land Improvement Act will provide it. He alleges he is borne down by rates, particularly the poor's rate; let him employ the people in draining and subsoiling his land, and his rate will be light. In fact, the provisions of the Land Improvement Act meet nearly every requirement necessary for the agricultural improvement of the country. We hear on all sides that it is impossible to support the present pauper population, but it should be borne in mind that the people have become paupers from failure of employment; and it is gratifying to know that, where employment has been afforded them on useful works their labour has been rendered productive, and that when employed by task, as is universally the case in the land improvement, as well as the arterial drainage, they have become industrious, skilful, and thankful labourers; and it is to be observed that, including the attendant main drainage, every acre drained and subsoiled gives full employment to about 160 labourers for one day.”

That was the opinion expressed nearly fifteen years ago, and it had been fully confirmed by the subsequent operation of these Acts. What was the financial result of the working of the first Land Improvement Act? Advances had been made to as many as 2,000 owners. The number of loans had been 4,210. The largest loan made was £7,000. The smallest £100. There had been 2,092 loans under £500. The total amount advanced since 1847 had been £1,866,000, the whole of which had been expended in the permanent improvement of land. The re-payments were nearly as satisfactory in Ireland as the re-payments in England, for since 1847 the re-payments of principal and interest had amounted to £1,618,000. The arrears amounted altogether to only £3,899, every shilling of which was, he believed, good and recoverable. He had received a letter from the Secretary of the Board of Works expressing his opinion to that effect. The conclusion to which he came to was, that the principle of these Acts was good, and that it was desirable, if possible, to extend the benefits they conferred. The proposed Bill was very simple and short, numbering only twenty-one clauses. The improvements it proposed to effect were—thorough and main drainage, reclamation of waste land, and the clearing of land from rocks and stones, the removal of old and useless fences, the making of new fences, the making of farm roads, and the erection of farmhouses and other buildings. With the exception of the reclamation of land from the sea, and other works of a large character, which were not suitable for tenants' improvements, the Bill comprised nearly every description of improvement that had been introduced in former Bills. As to the machinery by which the objects of the Bill were to be attained, he proposed that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with the approval of the Commissioners of the Treasury, should appoint a Commissioner of Public Works, for the special conduct of the operations to be carried out under the Act. Machinery existed already in the Board of Works, which rendered the appointment of a large staff unnecessary. The Special Commissioner would have to devote his whole time to the discharge of duties imposed by the Act; but he would be associated with the present Commissioners, and he would have the advantage of the assistance of the solicitor, architect, and inspectors, and the various officers of the Board now employed under the Lands Improvement Acts. He (Lord Naas) did not propose to create a new department, to employ a large staff, or to incur any great expense. The great difference between the position of the Special Commissioner and that of the officers of the Present Board of Works would be that he would be more directly under the control of the Irish Government, and that the Irish Government, in conjunction with the Treasury, would be responsible for all his acts. More than once objection had been taken to the action of the Commissioners of the Board of Works in Ireland, and complaint had been made that there was not sufficient responsibility attached to their conduct. He therefore proposed that this Commissioner should be more under the control of the Irish Government than the present officers of the Board, and in this way the objections alluded to would be obviated. He proposed that this Commissioner should have the power, from time to time, with the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant and the Commissioners of the Treasury, to make rules and regulations for the carrying out of the Act, to frame rules for the making of preliminary inquiries, to defray and secure the re-payment of expenses, to see to the due expenditure of each instalment of a loan, and the proper execution of the improvements, and to collect the rent-charges payable under the Act. These rules and regulations were, within a month of their being framed, to be submitted to Parliament, and an annual Report was to be presented to the Lord Lieutenant and also laid before this House. In order to provide the money which would be required in the first instance to give effect to the provisions of the Bill, he did not propose to ask Parliament to make any advances beyond those which had been already sanctioned. The Act passed last year, in addition to authorizing the Commissioners of the Board of Works to extend the time for repayment, sanctioned the advance out of the Consolidated Fund of £1,000,000 for the improvement of land in Ireland, and this, added to the advances authorized by three preceding Acts, gave a total of £3,000,000. He was happy to state that no further sum would be for the present required. The advances made under the four Acts, up to the 31st of January last, amounted to £1,874,042; the balance unissued was therefore £1,125,958. The claims outstanding sanctioned at that time amounted to £111,460; the loans applied for but not then sanctioned would absorb £36,656; these two sums amounted to £148,116, and that left a balance of £977,842. So that there was nearly £1,000,000, the advance of which had been sanctioned by Parliament, available for the object of land improvement. It might be said that this money was advanced for landlords' improvements, and that now it was proposed it should be laid out by tenants. There was not, however, much weight in that objection, for all the money was to be spent on the landlords' property, and if the plan worked well Parliament, he believed, would never be unwilling to lend the credit of the country—for that was what it came to—for an object so desirable as the improvement of the soil in Ireland. There could, therefore, be no substantial objection to the proposal that this £1,000,000 should be devoted to the purposes of the Bill. The next proposal was, that if any tenant was desirous of availing himself of the provision of the measure he should apply to the Commissioners by memorial, pretty much in the same form as the owner now did when he made application for advances, and that most of the proceedings necessary in the one case should be requisite in the other. The Commissioners would then give notice to the landlord and also to the person in actual possession of the land that such an application had been made, and would proceed to institute the proper inquiries in order to enable them to judge of the propriety of the proposed improvement. As soon as the Commissioners were satisfied that the improvements were good and would immediately or prospectively effect a considerable increase in the value of the land—that is, an increase above the charge which it was proposed to place upon it—they would grant to the tenant a certificate sanctioning the improvement, and that certificate would be in the form provided by the rules and regulations he had alluded to before. The proceedings, therefore, to be taken so far would be almost the same on the part of the tenant as were now required on the part of the owner. With regard to the different kinds of improvement he intended to make some distinction. As he had already stated there were six kinds of improvement proposed under the Bill. The first three were the main and thorough drainage of land, the reclamation of waste lands, the clearing of the soil from rocks and stones, and the removal of old and useless fences. That these must always be improvements would be admitted; but there was a substantial difference between these three descriptions of improvement and the three last, which were the erection of farm buildings and dwellings, the making of new fences, and the construction of farm roads. With regard to the first three classes, therefore, it was proposed that the Commissioners having been applied to in the first instance by the tenant, and having given notice to the landlord of his intention to permit the improvements, that notice should be sufficient. But, with respect to the last three classes of improvement, concerning which great difference of opinion might exist, and concerning which the landlord might think that they ought not to be made, and might be contrary to ulterior objects which he might have with regard to his property, it was proposed that if, in that case, after hearing what was to be said upon the subject, the landlord expressed his dissent, the Commissioners should not be allowed to sanction the improvements. He had said there was a substantial difference between the two classes of improvements. The first description, if done in an efficient manner, could not but be regarded as beneficial, and could not but make the increased value of the land greater than the charge proposed to be laid upon it. No difference of opinion ought to exist on the subject. But it might be otherwise with regard to the other class. He did not think it necessary, therefore, that the dissent of the landlord should put a stop to improvements of the first kind. The Commissioners should proceed, then, to advance out of the money provided by the Act the amount specified, and when that advance had been made he should make a certificate of charge, and the land would be affected by that certificate precisely in the same way as it was affected by the certificates of charge for improvements made by the owner. The term of repayment was to be thirty-five years, and the charges should be repaid in the usual half-yearly instalments in the same way as were the charges under the old Lands Improvement Act. He now came to another portion of the Bill, which he hoped would be still more extensively useful than the part he had described. He proposed that in cases where the tenant should find it more to his convenience to lay out either his money or labour on his holding, if he should think fit to go through those easy and simple forms which he would have to do in order to borrow the money, the Commissioner would be enabled to charge the land precisely in the same way as if the money had been advanced by him. The tenant would, therefore, be in this position—if at any time he was evicted or wished to leave his land, or to get back the sum of money that he had laid out upon it; if he should be able to prove to the Commissioner that the improvements made were maintained in an efficient manner, he would then be entitled to go and receive back from the Commissioner the money charged upon the land in a lump sum, minus only the instalments

he should have paid had he borrowed the money in the ordinary way. The tenant, therefore, would be able during the period of his tenancy to recover from the Commissioner the remaining portion of the charge placed upon the land. There was ample provision made to enable the Commissioner to discover whether the improvements were maintained in thorough and efficient repair. The Commissioners would be able to say to the tenant, "If you have no money to lay out, if you show us that the improvements are good, we will lend you the money; or if you have money or its equivalent—labour—we will secure it to you in such a manner as will repay you over and over again for the improvements you may have effected." The Bill had a great advantage in this respect. The great blot in the tenant-right system of the North of Ireland was this, that the outgoing tenant in every case received a lump sum for his improvements from the incoming tenant. It was quite right that the outgoing tenant should be paid in this manner for his improvements, but it was very much to the disadvantage of the incoming tenant, because by the payment of a large sum, which he ought to have kept for the improvement of his farm, he was—as gentlemen connected with the North of Ireland could testify—often pauperized and rendered incapable of working his farm in a profitable manner. He would, therefore, by this Bill save tenants who chose to take the benefit of it from so great an evil. The outgoing tenant would still receive a lump sum, but the incoming tenant would be able to spread the payment of it over a number of years, the number to be measured by the remainder of the thirty-five years which still had to run. There was another great benefit which it was intended to confer upon the country by this Bill. They heard a good deal of improvements effected by the tenant, and no doubt some had been made; but they all knew that there was in Ireland a great want of agricultural knowledge, and that a great deal of money and labour had been expended upon works which were no improvements at all. It was intended by the machinery of this Bill to put within the reach of the tenant sound agricultural instruction for the making of improvements. The improvements before they were undertaken would have to be specified and described, and afterwards they would have to be carried out according to the description and specification.

They would not be carried out in an expensive and extravagant manner, but according to the plans which our improved agricultural science and knowledge showed to be the best. Objection might be taken to the necessity which the Bill would impose upon perhaps a poor tenant, of serving such a notice as this. But let the House consider how it would act. The tenant would not be placed in the position in which other Bills put him, of serving notice upon the landlord, which, in many cases, would, he feared, be taken as a hostile proceeding. He would serve the notice on the Commissioner. Again, it would be objected that a poor and illiterate man would find great difficulty in drawing up the necessary specifications. But that would not be the case, for in every district there would be a surveyor of the Board, who would be perfectly competent to draw up those specifications and plans; and more than that, the officer of the Board would have a direct personal interest in persuading the tenant to make those applications, because he would be paid according to the work which the tenant undertakes. There would, therefore, be no difficulty in a tenant obtaining the assistance of a person of sufficient skill in drawing up notices and plans. There was no country in the world which offered such facilities for the framing of such notices as Ireland, inasmuch as there was an admirable staff of surveyors in the country—one in each county—fully competent to perform those duties which the Bill proposed. Having placed the working of the measure in the hands of the Commissioner, he did not think it necessary to limit the outlay with regard to the size of the holding, because the Commissioner could not sanction any improvement unsuitable to the holding, or which would not increase its substantial value. The extent of land which would probably be affected by the measure would be very large. A Return, which had been prepared with the assistance of Sir Richard Griffiths the Commissioner for valuation, and which was one of the most important Returns ever made connected with the owners and occupiers of land in Ireland, would shortly be laid on the table of the House. Excluding altogether the tenements in towns or in the neighbourhood of towns, and those which could in any respect be regarded as urban, it showed the number of purely agricultural holdings, with the area, value, and population of each district. The number of such holdings in Ireland was 608,864. Were the Bill applied to all holdings of the value of £10 and upwards, it would include 242,998; if to holdings of £15 and upwards, it would include 165,193; and if to those of £20 and upwards, 119,214. Taking the average valuation of the holdings under £10 to be £6, the Bill, if limited to the former sum, would embrace holdings valued at £7,980,552 out of a total of £10,175,748, or as nearly as possible 4-5ths of the holdings in all Ireland. As, however, the small farms were mostly situate in Ulster, where tenant-right already existed to a great extent, it would actually include nearly 9-10ths in value, and at least 5-6ths of the whole surface of Ireland. These were the principal provisions of the Bill, to which he had added two clauses relating to fixtures, taken from the Bill introduced by Mr. Napier in 1852. These would simplify the law on that subject, and would clear up some of the doubts which attended the construction of two recent statutes. They provided that all buildings and fixtures hereafter attached to the holding by the tenant at his sole expense, and not erected in pursuance of any contract, obligation, or agreement on his part, should be his absolute property, and might be removed by him at any period of his tenancy. The only stipulation was that he should give notice of his intention to the landlord, and that the latter should have the option of purchasing them at a valuation fixed by two arbitrators, or, in case they disagreed, by an umpire to be then appointed. These clauses went very little beyond the existing law, especially the provisions of the Act of 1860; but as there was some doubt as to the operation of that clause, they would, he hoped, receive the sanction of the House. He had thus explained the provisions of the measure, which, based upon the principle of a well-known and successful code, though it contained nothing new in principle, applied well-known principles in an extended and novel form, such as had never before been proposed. It was framed entirely in the interests of the Irish tenantry, and he believed that any occupier desirous of securing the benefit of his improvements would experience but little difficulty in availing himself of its provisions. While, however, it would tend to encourage industry and increase contentment, to promote exertion by the tenant, and to make his dwelling more fit than it usually is in Ireland for human habitation, the landlord also would, he believed, be no inconsiderable gainer. The Bill was calculated to show to the tenant that he had nothing to do but really and honestly to take advantage of it, and he would be able to make sure that that which he sowed he should also reap. If it benefited the tenant, it must also benefit the landlord, because there were no two classes in the social state whose interests were more identical than those of the landlord and tenant. The well-being of the tenant was really the life-blood of the prosperity of the landlord. The tenant might exist alone; but it was clear that the landlord could not exist without the tenant. He asked the House to consider whether the Bill would not really go far to remove many of the grievances complained of. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), in a remarkable speech which he delivered last Session, thus summed up what he regarded as the objects to be kept in view with reference to the Irish tenantry—

“How are the present tenantry, or the best of them, to be raised into a superior class of farmers? . . . Give them what you can of the encouraging influences of ownership. Give them an interest in improvement. Enable them to be secure of enjoying the fruits of their own labour and outlay. Let their improvements be for their own benefit, and not solely for those whose land they till.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 1091.] Now, this was exactly what the present measure was calculated to accomplish. It would enable the tenant to obtain all those advantages by the exercise of industry and exertion, which was the only way by which any tenant, whatever the nature of his tenure, could expect to obtain them. He would not describe the Bill as a settlement of the question. In a free country, and in an age of rapid change, it was presumptuous to affirm that any great question, political or social, was absolutely settled; but he believed that if the House, after calmly considering and possibly amending it, should pass this measure into law, it would remove many, if not all, the complaints that had been urged from time to time on behalf of the occupiers of land in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Leave be given to bring in a Bill to promote the improvement of Land by Occupying Tenants in Ireland.”—(Lord Naas.)

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would not attempt on that occasion to discuss what his noble Friend called the simple, but what appeared to him the very complicated and elaborate provisions of this measure. He must, however, congratulate him on having—though somewhat timid and restrictive in his application of it—entirely departed from the principle which he so zealously impressed upon the House last Session for the purpose of defeating the second reading of the Bill introduced by the late Government. The Resolution which his noble Friend then moved declared that compensation should be given to the tenant in respect only of improvements made with the consent of the landlord; whereas, with regard to one class of improvements made in the land—namely, drainage, reclamation, and clearing of land from stones, and the removal of old and useless fences, his noble Friend, in defiance of his own antecedents, now entirely abandoned that principle. It was only to be regretted that he had not carried his change of opinion further, and had not extended the principle to improvements in farmhouses and buildings, which were above all others required on Irish farms. Upon the first blush, the measure appeared liable to many and serious objections, the cardinal one being to the lending of money by the Treasury to those who were in one sense tenants-at-will. It was surprising that the present Treasury should have consented to such a proposal. The principle of lending money on land to those who had a long interest in it was a recognised one; but his noble Friend proposed to make loans of the public money to tenants who were liable to be removed at six months' notice. This, of course, was an objection from an official or Governmental point of view, but he thought it was one of no slight importance, and one which he should have thought would have nipped the Bill in the bud. Another objection was that the plan of his noble Friend required more from the poor Irish tenant than could be fairly required from him. The fatal error which had prevented the twenty-five ghosts of Bills spoken of by the noble Lord from being embodied into Acts of Parliament, and which had led to the Act of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) becoming a dead letter, was that too much had been expected from the peasantry in the way of putting those elaborated processes in motion. His noble Friend had spoken of the tenant arriving at the same result by this Bill as the late Government had intended he should arrive at by theirs, and he gave him credit for that intention; but before one arrived he must start. What he feared was that under the Bill of his noble Friend the Irish peasant never would be able to start on the race of improvement. Was it to be supposed that the Irish tenant would go through all the proposed forms of applying to the Board of Works for a loan to enable him to begin and carry on his improvements? He must confess that to him it appeared that unless some of these preliminaries were struck out, and the proceeding were made more simple, the Bill would contain in itself a fatal obstacle to its provisions being carried out by the occupiers of Ireland. It was this view which had induced the late Government to proceed on a totally different plan, and to provide what he might call a self-acting piece of machinery. The principle upon which they had proceeded was not only to change, but actually to reverse, the general presumption of the existing law as regarded landlord and tenant in Ireland. In nine cases out of ten, improvements on the land in Ireland were made by the tenant. Under the existing law, those improvements were handed over to the landlord on the expiration of the tenancy, unless there had been an agreement to the contrary. In the Bill brought in by the late Government that principle was reversed, and those improvements became the property of the tenant, unless the two parties had specially agreed to the contrary. He believed a self-acting system, such as that, would have had a most salutary influence on public opinion, and on the dealings between landlords and tenants in Ireland. He did not wish to prejudge the Bill of his noble Friend; but he feared from the character of its machinery that the measure would not work in the beneficial manner that the Government wished and intended it should.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, there was an unintentional inaccuracy in the statement of the noble Lord that previously to 1845 no person possessing popular influence in Ireland had manifested an interest in the settlement of the land question. Long previously to 1845 O'Connell had pointed to the position of the Irish tenant, and indicated the manner in which it ought to be improved. The Bill now before the House must be regarded as one of the most important measures of the Government; because, no doubt, it formed part of that great scheme by which, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they were to stop the hæmorrhage of people from Ireland, and by which, according to the Attorney General for Ireland, there was to be a prodigious development of that country's resources. Much must have been expected from the measure, because it was known that one of its principal framers was acting under a revulsion of feeling. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland had more than once stated in that House that the measures brought forward to improve the relations between landlord and tenant would have the effect of injuring rather than of benefiting the tenant. He was far from blaming the noble Lord for having changed his mind. He rejoiced at the circumstance, because he thought it was a confession on the noble Lord's part that those relations were not satisfactory, and that those who would have the confidence of the Irish people must endeavour to deal with the land question. The House and the country had now to consider whether the Bill which the noble Lord proposed to introduce would be accepted as a satisfactory settlement of the land question. It was quite possible that the provisions of the Bill might be good in themselves, but, at the same time, fall so far short of what was required as to insure the condemnation of the Bill as a proposal for such settlement. The land question was not an abstruse one. They all knew of what it was the occupiers complained. They all admitted that every facility which could be given to all classes of cultivators to improve the land ought to be given to them, and that every obstacle in the way of such improvement ought to be removed. He believed that this Bill would have no beneficial effect practically on the masses of occupiers, while it might make that position worse than it was at present if it could possibly be accepted as a final settlement of the land question. He believed the provisions of the Bill might in themselves be good; but it never could be accepted by the occupiers as a fair settlement of the land question.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, he wished to inquire whether it would be necessary for the tenant to get the landlord's sanction before he could borrow money for improvements?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) said, that as one of the framers of the Bill, he shared in the responsibility of the proposals now before the House. He was surprised to hear the charge that the noble Lord had departed from the principles upon this subject on which he acted last year; and he could only account for the charge by supposing that it was forgotten that the present Bill was founded upon totally different principles from that of last Session. The Bill of the late Government proposed that the tenant, without notice to the landlord, might make improvements, and that after a number of years, and when there could no longer be an opportunity of testing the validity of the claim in a satisfactory manner, he might demand compensation for those improvements from the landlord or his successor. Under the Bill which his noble Friend sought to introduce, all parties were effectually guarded. The tenant was made to a certain extent independent of the landlord for improvements made in the land; but, on the other hand, the landlord had a security that the improvements would be beneficial. Notice was required, but it was notice to a public officer, independent of both the parties, whose duty it was to see that the money was honestly expended, and that the improvements were bond fide, and such as to increase the value of the land. Was it fair to represent such a proposal as a departure from the principle on which resistance was last year made to the proposals of the then Government? Improvements in the land were distinguishable in general from improvements on the land. There were improvements on the land, particularly in the case of buildings, by which a landlord might be improved out of his estate; buildings of so extensive a character, and so entirely unsuited to the character of the holding, that the landlord might never be able to recover anything proportionate through an increased letting value. The veto of the landlord against this latter class of improvements was to be exercised after the Commissioner, an impartial public officer, had been afforded the opportunity of putting before him reasons which ought to be solid. If the landlord were convinced that the change was really for the benefit of the estate, the veto of course would not be exercised; but if he were not convinced, he had clearly a right to exercise that veto. The next objection of the right hon. Gentleman was that the money to be lent to the tenant was the money of the State. But whose money did the Bill of last year propose to lend? The money of the landlord, without security or check of any kind. The present Bill, on the contrary, only sanctioned what would be a secure investment, for the money was to be invested under bond fide inspection from time to time by a public officer. As to the fear that tenants of small holdings would not understand the complicated provisions of the Bill, what were these when looked into? Printed forms containing all the necessary heads would be freely supplied to persons requiring them, and the Inspector in the district would supply every information requisite as to how these were to be filled up. When a tenant was about to give the legal notices, it surely was not too much to expect that he should have made up his own mind as to the character of the improvements which he contemplated. Between the tenant and a captious or objecting landlord, if any such should be found, an impartial public officer was judicially interposed by the Bill. He would not enter into a discussion of what the hon. Member for Tralee called "the land question." He did not really know what the land question meant. But he might suggest that this measure afforded a very good test of what some meant by that phrase. If by the land question were meant something in the nature of a transfer of property from the landlord to the tenant, this measure was not intended to do anything of the kind, or to aid or abet any such design. But if it meant merely an honest desire to get secured to the tenant the value of bond fide improvements effected in the land, then he believed this measure would deal justly and effectually with the land question. As to borrowing money, the provisions of the Bill, when these were in the hands of Members, would bear upon their face evidence that they were intended to apply to improvements in the land as distinguished from those on the land—that was to say, to improvements by which all who were interested in the land would be benefited.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he admitted that the Bill would not constitute a settlement of the land question; but he did not think the objections taken by his right hon. Friend (the Member for Louth) were well founded. It was a very fortunate thing, he thought, that his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been able to induce the Treasury to lend the money of the State to the Irish tenant farmers to improve their lands. As to any objections on that score, let the noble Lord settle those with his own Colleagues; as far as the country was concerned, it was of great benefit that the noble Lord had been able to carry his Colleagues along with him.

Bearing in mind that of the £3,000,000 advanced for improvements in land a balance of £1,200,000 was available, the noble Lord, he thought, was quite justified in his proposal. Moreover, the improvements being made in the land itself, and remaining a charge upon the land, there would always be good security for the investment. He found no fault now with the noble Lord for any opinion which he might have expressed in former times. He had come down now, in the responsible position of Chief Secretary for Ireland, speaking the sentiments of the Government, to recommend a principle which went considerable lengths in the direction for which Members at that side of the House always contended. He wished the measure had been more extensive; but such as it was it ought to be welcomed, and, if possible, improved when before the House in detail.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to express his grateful thanks to the noble Lord for having introduced the Bill, the principle of which he hoped, for the advantage of Ireland, would be carried out. The people of Ireland were in a very distressed condition owing to the state of the law as regarded landlord and tenant, and any measure which would have the effect of alleviating that distress ought to have the sanction of every Member of that House. If this question could be settled the people of Ireland would become more happy and prosperous, and in the future would be as loyal as the citizens of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions.

MR. BLAKE said, he thought the Bill a good one as far as it went, but it did not meet the case of three-fourths of the tenants of Ireland. The noble Lord, who understood the Irish land question as well as any Member of that House, must see that its provisions did not meet the case of the tenant who little by little, without the consent of or having given notice to his landlord, and probably without any settled intention of doing so at the outset, by long years of labour reclaimed the bog or cleared the mountain side of stones. In many cases, also, he believed that the very dread of the landlord entertained by the tenantry would deter them from giving notice to the Commissioner.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he thought that the Bill would be in a great degree inoperative, because, if it became law, a tenant would not be able to make improvements without the consent of the landlord. If a landlord did not desire his land to be improved, he would forthwith give his tenant notice to quit. He feared that the Bill of the noble Lord would not settle the land question in Ireland.

MR. GREGORY said, he approved of the principle contained in the Bill of allowing the tenant to become a borrower, which might get rid of many existing difficulties which occasioned the eviction of tenants, under whatever circumstance they might be evicted. The value of their improvements would, at all events, not be lost to them. The proposal of the noble Lord seemed, however, to be surrounded with considerable difficulty. The system was too complicated and elaborate for a simple people like the Irish peasantry. The appointment of the local inspectors, who were not to be paid salaries, but according to the amount of money expended on the work under their supervision, might have the effect of increasing the expenditure without due regard to the requirements of the land. The noble Lord must not flatter himself that this Bill, however well it might be accepted, would settle the land question. He had been much about Ireland of late, and had endeavoured to ascertain from the people what their feeling in the matter was, and he was convinced as to what was at the bottom of that discontent which had made the soil there so ready to receive the seeds of every attempt made against our Empire. The source of discontent in Ireland was not a feeling that the tenantry were not paid for their improvements, but a conviction that the whole system of land tenure in the country was abnormal, since the tenants had no security for their holdings. In Scotland, on the contrary, they found a tenure in which the largest amount of produce was derived from land; while, at the same time, the largest rents were there paid, and the tenants were contented. Security of tenure, even for a limited period, was the source of Scotland's contentment; insecurity was the cause of Ireland's discontent. Some Irish landlords were surprised at the views he entertained, knowing the perfect security their tenants had enjoyed from father to son, and how little weight they attached to leases. But it was not for the good, but for the bad, that he would legislate; and the language of all the tenants advocated before the late Committee was to this effect:—that if all landlords were considerate and just, there would be no cry for tenant right. There were, however, too many cases where tenants were turned out, sometimes from caprice, and sometimes from interested motives, under circumstances which produced the most painful impression in the country, and gave rise to that feeling which indisposed the people to the institutions under which they lived. He was convinced that if the general system of tenure in Ireland was assimilated to the system in Scotland, and the tenants were secure of their holdings for a certain period, every man thus secured would be, as it were, a sworn special constable in favour of law and order. He should do his best to assist the noble Lord; but he did not think we should ever have thorough peace in Ireland until the tenure of land was assimilated to the tenure in Scotland and Prussia, and in those other countries where agrarian discontent was unknown.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he had looked in vain to find a satisfactory measure in the Bill of the noble Lord, and he regretted that he had not been able to find it. He was anxious to give the noble Lord all the assistance in his power if the Bill could be made a satisfactory one, but he feared that that was impossible. He believed that a much shorter and more effective road must be taken in dealing with the question, which was one more of tenure than of compensation, and he believed the Bill to be brought in by his hon. Friend (Mr. Agar-Ellis), which related solely to the tenure of land, would be much more likely to prove an effective remedy for the existing state of things. The evil against which he wished them to provide was not one of a merely imaginary character, and he would give an instance of the mode in which it operated. A Belfast merchant had lately purchased in the county of Down a large estate, on which were settled a thriving tenantry. But those people were tenants-at-will, who paid 7s. 6d. per Irish acre. The new proprietor, thinking, as he had a perfect right to do, that that sum was too small, served the different holders with notices to quit; but, at the same time, intimated that he was prepared to accept from them rents which were to be increased by sums varying from 37s. 6d. to 57s. 6d. per acre. They declined to accept that offer, although some of them expressed their readiness to pay an additional rent of 40s. per acre, and as he was not satisfied with that proposal, they were all threatened with the total loss of their farms. But if that threat were enforced, they would, under the operation of the existing law, in ten days, be thrown helpless upon the world, and be deprived of any kind of claim to compensation for that improved value which the application of their own capital and industry had given to the land.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he wished to congratulate the noble Lord on the introduction of his Bill, and on the reception which the House had accorded to it. Until they had seen the measure it was premature to talk of its complication. The noble Lord had been taunted with altering his opinion on the subject; but surely, considering the recent circumstances of Ireland, he could well afford to bear that reproach. The emigration still going on from that country was a most serious matter; and, although a Bill such as this might not stop that emigration, yet anything which checked that tendency would be a blessing to Ireland. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had contrasted the Scotch system of tenure with that prevalent in Ireland; but how was it possible to compare the case of a country where land was so much subdivided as it was in Ireland with that of a country like Scotland, where the farms were generally of great size? The introduction to a moderate extent of the tenant right principle which existed in Ulster would, he thought, prove beneficial. That principle might be carried to an unreasonable length, so as to be a bar to the landlord's sanctioning improvements; and he had known a man to be pauperized by the large sum he had to pay for the tenant right. But where there was a moderate amount of tenant right, and where the tenant had a security, whether by a lease or through his confidence in his landlord, he had a permanent interest in the soil, and would think twice before he exchanged the security and associations of his native country for the attractions of the new one across the Atlantic.

MR. REARDEN said, he thought they were indebted to the noble Lord for the kind intentions with which he had introduced that measure; but, at the same time, he (Mr. Rearden) believed that the scheme would be found to be of very little value unless it were considerably amended. He should propose Amendments when the Bill was in Committee. He thought it fell far short of a final settlement of the land question.

MR. MURPHY said, he wished to suggest that when the Bill got into Committee a clause should be introduced into it providing that a tenant-at-will, spending his own money on improvements, should have some kind of security in the shape of an extended period for his occupancy, and not be liable to be turned out summarily at the end of six months. He gave the noble Lord every possible credit for good intentions; but doubted whether the plan for making advances to tenants would be found to work in practice where they had not some security of tenure. The whole complaint of tenants in Ireland, as a class, was the want of security of tenure, in other words, an incentive to lay out their money, and to take an interest in their business. He remembered the time when leases in Ireland were the rule and not the exception as now. He thought a better Bill might have been introduced, but he reserved further observations for the Committee.

LORD NAAS said, with regard to the charge of inconsistency which had been sought to be fastened upon him, that it was true he had moved a Resolution last year in the terms which had been quoted; but that Resolution was, in effect, the Resolution of the late Government. It was proposed in the Committee in 1865, by the desire and with the consent of two Members who represented the late Government in that Committee, one of whom was the right hon. Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell). So that if he was open to the charge of inconsistency in to a certain extent now departing from the principle of the Resolution of last year, how much more was the late Government open to it, seeing that they departed much sooner from that principle, and introduced a Bill directly opposed to it in every clause? He therefore left the House to judge on whom the charge of inconsistency principally rested; but, in reality, he only extended the provisions of the Land Improvements Acts now, which provided that the charge of re-payment should attach itself to the land, not to the owner. But he now turned to a more important point. It was said the Bill proposed that the Government should lend money to occupiers in Ireland, no matter what was the size of their holdings. Now, it was perfectly true that it did so to a certain extent; but, in reality, the charge was not upon the occupying tenant, but on the land; and the security to the Treasury for the loan under the Bill would be as sound, good, and easily enforced as a security taken under the Land Improvement Act. Additional security to what was given by that Act was taken; because the Bill provided, with regard to the re-payment of the instalments, that they should, if the Commissioners saw fit, be collected with, and in the same manner as, the county cess and the poor rate.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he wished to ask whether they would be levied from the tenant or the landlord?

LORD NAAS said, they would be levied from the occupier of the land whoever he might be, and not only would the land be liable, but the property of the tenant would also be liable till the money was paid. In the case of a change of tenancy, the tenant would take the land with that charge upon it. The Bill exactly met the case suggested by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake), with reference to the reclamation of mountain or bog land. As to the assertion that landlords could evade the Bill by giving their tenants notice to quit, he would ask what man could frame a Bill not open to the same objection? The Bill of the late Government not only permitted the landlord to evade the law by giving his tenant notice to quit, but actually suggested that course to him by the contract clause framed for the purpose of enabling the landlord to evade the preceding one. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had made some excellent remarks upon the subject of agriculture in Scotland; but, although they would all join with him in wishing for Ireland as happy a state of things as existed in Scotland, he did not believe the tenantry in Ireland would prosper under a system of short leases. Irish tenants would not relish having their holding put up for auction and let to the highest bidder after their nineteen years' lease had expired. Short leases might be profitable to landlords, and conduce to the improvement of the land; but they would operate harshly upon the holder, and lead to a constant change of tenantry, which was undesirable. There were no holdings the tenancy of which were oftener changed than these Scotch cases, and at the termination of the lease the land was frequently re-valued and sold by auction to the highest bidder. He hoped the House would calmly consider this Bill, which was simply a Bill to provide a tenant with compensation for his improvements. His Bill did not affect the question of tenure, and he would not recommend legislation upon the subject. If the House attempted to force the landlords of Ireland to grant any specific tenure, hon. Gentlemen would find the attempt both dangerous and difficult; and the result would show that the greatest sufferer by coercion of this description would be the tenant.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL—(No. 9.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said: In laying before your Lordships the details of one of the largest and most important measures which for many years it has been the duty of any Colonial Minister in this country to submit to Parliament, I must unaffectedly ask for the forbearance of the House. I have, however, this advantage in the performance of my task, that the present measure is not a question of political controversy, and that I may count almost as much upon the sympathy of many noble Lords opposite in the purposes of this great undertaking as upon those of my noble Friends on this side of the House with whom I am in the habit of acting. And here, in the very outset, I would wish to bear my testimony—whatever it may be worth—to the ability and patience with which my right hon. Predecessor in the Colonial Office, Mr. Cardwell, laboured to effect the consummation of this work. From the evidences, indeed, which I have seen in that office of the interest that he took in this question, I am confident, although it has fallen to my lot rather than his to submit this measure to Parliament, yet that there is no one in either House who will more sincerely rejoice in its success than the right hon. Gentleman.

My Lords, I will not detain your Lordships now by any lengthy recapitulation of the early history of this question. It is enough to say that, in one form or another, it has for many years been before the public mind in the British Provinces of North America. Lord Durham, when he proposed in his most able Report the legislative union of Upper and Lower Canada, distinctly contemplated the incorporation of the Maritime Provinces. But delays and difficulties intervened, and Lord Durham's intentions were never carried out. In 1858, however, Sir Edmund Head, then

Governor General of Canada, in his speech from the throne, announced the policy of Confederation to the Canadian Parliament; and in the autumn of that year, when my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) was in office, delegates from that Province came to this country to consult with Her Majesty's Government upon the subject. But matters were not then ripe, and it was not till 1864 that the first decided step was taken in furtherance of the proposal. In September of that year delegates from all the Maritime Provinces, including Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island, were assembled at Charlottetown to discuss the terms of a possible union of those Provinces alone; when the Canadian Parliament intervened and gave to the design a grander character by deputing representatives to propose the Confederation of all the British North American Colonies. The conference of Charlottetown was adjourned to Quebec, and there, in the month of October, those resolutions were drawn up which have since become famous under the name of "the Quebec Resolutions," and which, with some slight changes, form the basis of the measure that I have now the honour to submit to Parliament. To those resolutions all the British Provinces in North America were, as I have said, consenting parties, and the measure founded upon them must be accepted as a treaty of union. Since then, Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island have withdrawn from the union; and this Bill embraces only the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, of Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. The time, indeed, will come before long, I cannot doubt, when Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island will gravitate towards the common centre of this Confederation. Every consideration of policy and interest will lead them towards this conclusion. The time also is not distant when the broad and fertile districts to the west of Canada, now under the rule of a trading Company, will form part of the Confederation—perhaps it is not very far distant when even British Columbia and Vancouver's Island may be incorporated, and one single system of English law and commerce and policy extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Meanwhile let no one think lightly of the present proposed union, curtailed though it be of its original proportions. It will in area comprise some 400,000 square miles, or more than four times the size of England and Scotland; it will in population contain about 4,000,000 souls, of whom 650,000 were, at the last Census of 1861, men between twenty and sixty years of age, capable of bearing arms in defence of their country; and in revenue it possesses some £3,000,000.

The Bill opens by reciting the desire of the several Provinces to be federally united. It proceeds to invest the Crown with all Executive powers, by land and sea, for civil administration, and military defence. It proceeds to provide for the appointment of a Governor General—an officer charged with the duty of protecting Imperial interests, named by and responsible to the Crown. He will constitute the chief, if not the only, direct link by which the united Provinces will be connected with this country. His position will be one of dignity and station, equal in all ways to its Imperial importance, and a salary of £10,000 is by a clause in this Bill made a permanent third charge upon the general revenues. It is the desire of the Provinces to retain their separate and individual organization, and they will therefore be severally administered by Lieutenant Governors. At present these officers are appointed by the Crown; but henceforward they will receive their offices at the hands of the Governor General, acting under the advice of his Ministers. They will hold office during pleasure, though they will be subject to removal only on cause being shown, and under ordinary circumstances the term of their administration will be limited to five years.

I come now to the Legislature which it is proposed to create under this Bill. It is two-fold—a Central Parliament and Local Legislatures in each Province. I will deal with the Central Parliament first. It will be composed of two Chambers—an Upper Chamber, to be styled the Senate, and a Lower Chamber, to be termed, in affectionate remembrance of some of the best and noblest traditions of English history, the House of Commons. Of all problems to be solved in the creation of a Colonial Constitution, none is more difficult than the composition of an Upper House. This House is generally assumed to be the model—it would probably be hard to find a worthier or higher model—and men labour to re-produce the English House of Lords amongst English colonists, animated, it is true, by English instincts and feelings, but placed under social conditions which are wholly different. The materials for such a House are absolutely wanting in the colonies. The hereditary title to legislate, the great wealth, the large territorial property, the immemorial prescription, and the respect which has been for generations freely accorded to this ancient institution, have no place in the ideas of a young community. To attempt, therefore, a close and minute imitation of the English House of Lords is, I think, to court failure. There are, in my opinion, two broad principles to be kept in view in the creation of a Colonial Chamber: first, that it should be strong enough to maintain its own opinion, and to resist the sudden gusts of popular feeling; secondly, that it should not be so strong that it should be impenetrable to public sentiment, and therefore out of harmony with the other branch of the Legislature. These are conditions difficult under the most favourable circumstances to secure; but they are complicated in this instance by a third, which has been made a fundamental principle of the measure by the several contracting parties, and the object of which is to provide for a permanent representation and protection of sectional interests. I will briefly explain how far these three considerations appear to me to have been met in this Bill. The Senate will consist of seventy-two Members, the four Provinces being for this purpose divided into three sections, of which Upper Canada will be one, Lower Canada one, and the Maritime Provinces one. From each of these three sections an equal number of twenty-four Members will be returned. They will be nominated by the Governor General in Council for life. But as it is obvious that the principle of life nomination, combined with a fixed number of Members, might render a difference of opinion between the two Houses a question almost insoluble under many years, and might bring about what is popularly known as a Legislative dead-lock, a power is conferred upon the Crown—a power, I need not say, that would only be exercised under exceptional and very grave circumstances—to add six Members to the Senate, subject to a restriction that those six Members shall be taken equally from the three sections, so as in no way to disturb their relative strength, and that the next vacancies shall not be filled up until the Senate is reduced to its normal number. It may, perhaps, be said that the addition of six Members will be insufficient to obviate the Legislative discord against which we desire to provide. I am free to confess that I could have wished that the margin had been broader. At the same time, the average vacancies which have of recent years occurred in the nominated portion of the present Legislative Council of Canada, go far to show that, even in the ordinary course of events, the succession of Members will be rapid. I have received on this subject a Return which will be interesting. In 1856, forty-two Members answered to the call of the House, in 1858 there were but thirty-five, and in 1862 only twenty-five. Thus in six years no less than seventeen vacancies had occurred, showing an average of nearly three every year. When, therefore, a power on the part of the Crown to create six additional Members is supplemented by so large and so regular a change in the constitution of the Senate, it may be hoped that enough is done to maintain the Legislative harmony of the two Houses.

Your Lordships will observe that by the 25th clause security is given that the first list of Senators shall not be nominated under partisan influences. Their names will be a matter of careful agreement, to be submitted to and confirmed by the Crown, and to form part of the Proclamation of Union. The qualifications which are annexed to the office of Senator are not numerous, but they are important. He is to be of thirty years of age—and probably the average age will considerably exceed this—he must be a subject of Her Majesty—he must have a continuous real property qualification of 4,000 dollars over and above all debts and liabilities, and a continuous residence in the Province which he represents. On the other hand, he will become subject to disqualification if he fails in his attendance for two consecutive Sessions, if he takes an oath of allegiance to any foreign Power, if he is insolvent or convicted of crime, or if he ceases to be qualified in respect either of his property or his residence in his Province. There are some further details of procedure which are provided for, but which only need a general mention. The Speaker will be nominated by the Governor General on the part of the Crown, a quorum of fifteen will be required, and whenever the Members present are equally divided, the presumption—in imitation of the rule of this House—will be for the negative.

I now come to the constitution of the House of Commons. The principle upon which the Senate is constructed is, as I have explained, the representation and the protection of sectional interests. The principle upon which the House of Commons is founded is that of a representation in accordance with population. It will not be, indeed, a representation of mere numbers distributed equally in electoral districts; but whilst population is made the basis of representation, each Province will have its own number of representatives in proportion to their own population, and in proportion also to the population and representatives conjoined of their neighbours. Unlike other popular Assemblies, the Canadian House of Commons will be a variable number; but it will vary by reference to a particular standard. That standard will be given by Lower Canada, which is to retain its present quota of sixty-five Members, and will in fact be the proportion which those sixty-five Members bear to the population of the Province. If Lower Canada, with a population of 1,100,000, has sixty-five Members, Upper Canada, with a population of nearly 1,500,000, will have eighty-two Members. It may, indeed, happen that an increase of the total numbers of the House may become necessary. Power is reserved for this contingency; but in such case the increase will be regulated in all the other Provinces by reference to the number of Members representing Lower Canada, and by the proportion between those Members and the population in that Province. But as the representation of population will be based upon the census, there will be a decennial re-adjustment of it. And this leads me to observe that the Parliaments of British North America will be quinquennial. That decision was not, I believe, adopted without some debate. On the one side there was the precedent of the English Constitution; on the other, there was the example of the recent New Zealand Constitution, and the fact that the average duration of British Parliaments can hardly in recent times be said to exceed five years. Of the twenty-one Parliaments from the accession of George I. to that of William IV., comprising a period of 115 years, the average duration was under five years and a half; and of the ten Parliaments from the accession of William IV. to 1865, comprising a period of thirty-five years, the average duration has been three years and a half. Whilst in the last century no less than seven Parliaments attained the term of six years, in the present only two Parliaments have had so protracted an existence.

The Local Legislatures to be established in each Province stand next in order; and my task here is easy; for whilst the provisions regulating the constitution of the central Parliament are in the nature of permanent enactments, those which govern the Local Legislatures will be subject to amendment by those bodies. This por tion, therefore, of the Bill is intended to provide the temporary machinery by which each Province will be enabled to enter upon its new life and political duties. I ought, however, to observe that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick no material change will take place. The existing Parliaments in those provinces become the Provincial Legislatures, with their constitutions, their constituencies, and their local machinery unaltered. In Canada, the division of the Province has necessitated the creation of two Legislatures; but the clauses that provide for them are little more than a transcript of a vote agreed to by the Canadian Parliament in their last Session, in anticipation of this adjustment. In Lower Canada there will be a Legislative Council, of which the Members will be nominated for life, and an Assembly: in Upper Canada there will be but one Chamber for the management of local business.

My Lords, I now pass to that which is, perhaps, the most delicate and the most important part of this measure—the distribution of powers between the Central Parliament and the local authorities. In this is, I think, comprised the main theory and constitution of Federal Government; on this depends the practical working of the new system. And here we navigate a sea of difficulties. There are rocks on the right hand and on the left. If, on the one hand, the Central Government be too strong, then there is risk that it may absorb the local action and that wholesome self-government by the provincial bodies, which it is a matter both of good faith, and political expediency to maintain: if, on the other hand, the Central Government is not strong enough, then arises a conflict of State rights and pretensions, cohesion is destroyed, and the effective vigour of the central authority is encroached upon. The real object which we have in view is to give to the Central Government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in those questions that are of common import to all the Provinces; and, at the same time, to retain for each Province so ample a measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow and indeed compel them to exercise those local powers which they can exercise with great advantage to the community. In Australia there is at present a tendency towards the disintegration of the vast territories which are called colonies, because those who live at great distances on their extreme borders complain that they cannot obtain from the Central Parliaments the attention which they require. In New Zealand, on the other hand, an attempt—and not without success—has been made to combine considerable local powers with a general Government at the centre.

In this Bill the division of powers has been mainly effected by a distinct classification. That classification is fourfold. 1st, those subjects of legislation which are attributed to the Central Parliament exclusively; 2nd, those which belong to the Provincial Legislatures exclusively; 3rd, those which are subjects of concurrent legislation; and 4th, a particular question which is dealt with exceptionally. To the Central Parliament belong all questions of the public debt or property, all regulations with regard to trade or commerce, customs and excise, loans, the raising of revenue by any mode or system of taxation, all provisions as to currency, coinage, banking, postal arrangements, the regulation of the census, and the issue and collection of statistics. To the Central Parliament will also be assigned the enactment of criminal law. The administration of it indeed is vested in the local authorities; but the power of general legislation is very properly reserved for the Central Parliament. And in this I cannot but note a wise departure from the system pursued in the United States, where each State is competent to deal as it may please with its criminal code, and where an offence may be visited with one penalty in the State of New York, and with another in the State of Virginia. The system here proposed is, I believe, a better and safer one; and I trust that before very long the criminal law of the four Provinces may be assimilated—and assimilated, I will add, upon the basis of English procedure. Lastly, the fisheries, the navigation and shipping, the quarantine regulations, the lighting of the coast, and the general question of naval and military defence, will be placed under the exclusive control of the Central Government.

The principal subjects reserved to the Local Legislatures are the sale and management of the public lands, the control of their hospitals, asylums, charitable and municipal institutions, and the raising of money by means of direct taxation. The several Provinces, which are now free to raise a revenue as they may think fit, surrender to the Central Parliament all powers under this head except that of direct taxation. Lastly, and in conformity with all recent colonial legislation, the Provincial Legislatures are empowered to amend their own constitutions. But there is, as I have said, a concurrent power of legislation to be exercised by the Central and the Local Parliaments. It extends over three separate subjects—immigration, agriculture, public works. Of these the two first will in most cases probably be treated by the Provincial authorities. They are subjects which in their ordinary character are local; but it is possible that they may have, under the changing circumstances of a young country, a more general bearing, and therefore a discretionary power of interference is wisely reserved to the Central Parliament. Public works fall into two classes: First, those which are purely local, such as roads and bridges, and municipal buildings—and these belong not only as a matter of right, but also as a matter of duty, to the local authorities. Secondly, there are public works which, though possibly situated in a single Province, such as telegraphs, and canals, and railways, are yet of common import and value to the entire Confederation, and over these it is clearly right that the Central Government should exercise a controlling authority.

Lastly, in the 93rd clause, which contains the exceptional provisions to which I referred, your Lordships will observe some rather complicated arrangements in reference to education. I need hardly say that that great question gives rise to nearly as much earnestness and division of opinion on that as on this side of the Atlantic. This clause has been framed after long and anxious controversy, in which all parties have been represented, and on conditions to which all have given their consent. It is an understanding which, as it only concerns the local interests affected, is not one that Parliament would be willing to disturb, even if in the opinion of Parliament it were susceptible of amendment; but I am bound to add, as the expression of my own opinion, that the terms of the agreement appear to me to be equitable and judicious. For the object of the clause is to secure to the religious minority of one Province the same rights, privileges, and protection, which the religious minority of another Province may enjoy. The Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada, the Protestant minority of Lower Canada, and the Roman Catholic minority of the Maritime Provinces, will thus stand on a footing of entire equality. But in the event of any wrong at the hand of the local majority, the minority have a right of appeal to the Governor General in Council, and may claim the application of any remedial laws that may be necessary from the Central Parliament of the Confederation.

In closing my observations upon the distribution of powers, I ought to point out that just as the authority of the Central Parliament will prevail whenever it may come into conflict with the Local Legislatures, so the residue of legislation, if any, unprovided for in the specific classification which I have explained, will belong to the central body. It will be seen, under the 91st clause, that the classification is not intended "to restrict the generality" of the powers previously given to the Central Parliament, and that those powers extend to all laws made "for the peace, order, and good government" of the Confederation—terms which, according to all precedent, will, I understand, carry with them an ample measure of legislative authority. I will add, that whilst all general Acts will follow the usual conditions of colonial legislation, and will be confirmed, disallowed, or reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure by the Governor General, the Acts passed by the Local Legislature will be transmitted only to the Governor General, and be subject to disallowance by him within the space of one twelvemonth.

Clauses 102-126 regulate the conditions, pecuniary, and commercial, upon which the Provinces enter into union. They are so entirely matter of local detail and agreement, that I need not weary the House with any minute statement of them. It is enough to say that under them a consolidated fund is created, and that whilst lands and minerals are reserved to the several Provinces, the assets, property, debts, and liabilities of each will be transferred to the central body. By this agreement the public creditor who exchanges the security of each separate Province for the joint security of the four Provinces confederated, will find his position improved rather than deteriorated. As between the Provinces, it is proposed that the Local Legislatures should surrender to the Central Parliament all powers of raising revenue except by direct taxation. In return for this concession the Central Government will remit to the Local Legislatures certain fixed sums and a proportionate capitation payment, in order to enable them more conveniently to defray the costs of local administration. The debt of each Province has been fixed at a certain sum calculated; but if in the interval between the present time and the proclamation of Union that debt should be increased, the Province so exceeding will pay interest on the excess, and that interest will be deducted from the quota which they would otherwise receive from the central authority. In the same category must be placed the 145th clause, which makes it the duty of the Central Parliament and Government to provide for the commencement of the Intercolonial Railway within six months of the union. Such an undertaking was part of the compact between the several Provinces, and it was an indispensable condition on the part of New Brunswick. Successive Governments at home have entertained the scheme and have pledged themselves to the promise of more or less assistance. Meanwhile I will not now enter upon its details, because very shortly a further measure involving the consideration of pecuniary support must come before Parliament.

There is, indeed, a question of great importance and intimately connected with the future fortunes of the Confederated Provinces, and I may perhaps be asked why it finds no place in this measure. My Lords, I am fully alive to the urgent importance of coming to some settlement of the Hudson Bay Company's claims. The progress of American colonization on the West, the Confederation of the Provinces on the East, render an early decision necessary. But till this union is completed it would be a waste of time to discuss the relations of the Hudson Bay Company's territories to the Provinces. When once this Bill becomes law, it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government not to lose one day unnecessarily in dealing with this great subject.

Having thus stated the main provisions of this measure, I have only to add the designation of this new State to which we are about to give a distinct life and organization. It may seem a trifling question; but it has, in truth, been one neither unimportant nor free from difficulties. To the representatives of the Maritime Provinces belongs the credit of waiving local rights and pretensions; and they have felt the advantage of accepting a name not less familiar to the English labourer and artisan than it is distinguished by honourable traditions. Her Majesty has been pleased to express her approval of the name, and henceforth the United Provinces will be known as the "Dominion of Canada"—a designation which is a graceful tribute on the part of colonists to the monarchical principle under which they have lived and prospered, and which they trust to transmit unimpaired to their children's children. Whilst the individual Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick retain their present designation, Upper Canada will become the Province of Ontario, and Lower Canada the Province of Quebec.

I have now stated the general principles upon which this measure is founded. But to so large a scheme, as might naturally be expected, objections have been made; and these objections, or some of them, it is my duty to indicate. And first, it has been urged that this Union should have been a legislative rather than a federal one. I admit, to a certain extent, the validity of the objection. When Upper and Lower Canada were connected in a legislative Union, Lord Durham distinctly contemplated a similar incorporation of the Maritime Provinces. Nor are there wanting to this opinion many of the ablest of Canadian statesmen. But the answer is simply this—that a legislative Union is, under existing circumstances, impracticable. The Maritime Provinces are ill-disposed to surrender their separate life, and to merge their individuality in the political organization of the general body. It is in their case impossible, even if it were desirable, by a stroke of the pen to bring about a complete assimilation of their institutions to those of their neighbours. Lower Canada, too, is jealous, as she is deservedly proud, of her ancestral customs and traditions; she is wedded to her peculiar institutions, and will enter this Union only upon the distinct understanding that she retains them. The 42nd Article of the Treaty of Capitulation in 1760, when Canada was ceded by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to General Amhurst, runs thus—

"Les François et Canadiens continueront d'être gouvernés suivant la Coutume de Paris et les loix et usages établis pour ce pays."

The Coutume de Paris is still the accepted basis of their Civil Code, and their national institutions have been alike respected by their fellow-subjects and cherished by themselves. And it is with these feelings and on these terms that Lower Canada now consents to enter this Confederation.

But it has been objected that this union of Provinces will be a kingdom, not a Confederation, and that being an embodiment of the monarchical principle, it will constitute a challenge, to our powerful republican neighbour across the border. Now I am a loss to understand how these Provinces, when united, can be one whit more or whit less of a kingdom than when separate. There will be, with some few modifications, the same institutions, the same forms of government, and even the same men to give life and movement to them. It is but a development of the existing system. But whilst it is attacked by one critic as too monarchical in its character, it is assailed by another as too Republican, and we are warned that it must ere long on American soil become a Republic, and lead to the dismemberment of the Empire. Now I do not see special cause for apprehension from republican any more than from monarchical dangers; but I must submit that, at all events, the two allegations are fatally inconsistent with each other.

Again, it has been said that this great scheme owes its origin to the lust of territorial dominion on the part of one State, and that it is solely referable to the overweening ambition of Canada to exercise a supremacy over her sister Provinces. For this allegation I cannot see the smallest groundwork of argument; and, looking to the past history and the ordinary probabilities of these colonies, I can conceive nothing more unlikely than a combination of Upper and Lower Canada as against the Maritime Provinces. If, indeed, any one of these Provinces has a reasonable ground for apprehension, it is Lower Canada, with its distinct race and language and institutions, rather than Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which are in all essentials so akin to the great and populous Province of Upper Canada. But whilst this large scheme of union has been attributed to the desire of political supremacy on the part of Canada, it is in the same breath referred to the irreconcilable differences which are supposed to have divided Upper and Lower Canada. I believe, for my own part, that those differences have been greatly exaggerated; but anyhow it is clear that the two objections cannot both be correct. They destroy each other. And this, indeed, I may observe, is the case with several other objections that have been urged; as when, in England, we are told that the object of this scheme is the imposition of fresh burdens upon the mother country, and, in America, that its object will be the imposition of pecuniary charges upon the Maritime Provinces.

My Lords, I must not pass over another and a plausible objection to the policy of this measure. It is said that, whilst the commercial policy of Canada has been of a Protectionist, that of the Maritime Provinces has been of a more Liberal cha-raacter; and it is further argued that, when once the union of these Provinces shall be accomplished, the restrictive system of Canada will become uniform, and that we shall find ourselves excluded from the comparatively free markets which we have hitherto enjoyed. A Canadian would probably reply to this that the high tariff of Canada has been due to the necessities of the revenue rather than to a desire to foster her own industry. Of this we can be no judge; we can only accept the facts as we find them; but on those facts there is, as I think, an answer worthy of the attention of this House. Whatever may have formerly been the case, it is now unfair to draw a strong distinction between the commercial policies of Canada and of the Lower Provinces. Canada is by no means unanimous in her desire for Protectionist measures. On the contrary, the Canadian tariff has recently been brought into far greater harmony with that of this country. I understand that the duties on all manufactured articles—such as cottons, woollens, and leather—have been reduced in some cases from 25, but in all from 20 to 15 per cent. Partially-manufactured articles—such as bar-iron, tin, &c., which were formerly charged with a 10 per cent duty—now come in free; and lastly, all raw materials are exempt from duty. On the other hand, the reductions in the revenue due to these changes have been made good by stamps, by an increase of the Excise, and by duties on tea, sugar, and wines. Of these I may mention that the duty on tea is 4½d. per lb., and therefore very close upon that which exists here; that as regards sugar, they have adopted the same duties and the same system; whilst in the case of wines they have followed the same system, with this difference, that their duties are 60 per cent lower than our own. Such, indeed, has been the reduction effected, that the Canadian tariff, whilst still considerably in excess of the Nova Scotian, is less than that of New Brunswick. And, therefore, we have some right to hope that a Free Trade rather than a Protectionist policy will be the result of the union of Canada with the Lower Provinces. But if even it were otherwise, I could never ask this House to bargain with Canada, and to withhold its consent to a measure on which the hearts of our colonists and fellow-subjects are set, until they had adjusted their tariff to our liking. We must rather trust to time and the prevailing strength of our own commercial principles to induce the Provinces to adopt that view which is most consistent with our policy, and, as I believe, with their interests. I do not doubt what their choice will be; for, apart from other considerations, so long as the United States think it desirable to hem themselves in with the bounties and restrictions of a jealously protective system, so long it will be the obvious interest of British North America to open her ports to the free entrance of commerce.

I have now come to the last, but also the gravest, objection which has been raised. It is an objection which I cannot indeed admit, but to which I will endeavour to do justice. It is represented that this measure, which purports to rest upon the free consent of the various contracting parties, is distasteful to a large portion, if not a majority, of the inhabitants of Nova Scotia. My Lords, it has been the duty of Her Majesty's Government to weigh seriously the value of this objection. I am told that a petition will be presented in the House of Commons; but none has been laid, or, as far as I know, will be laid, on the table of this House. There are, however, petitions against this union, which will be found in the recent papers that have been presented to Parliament. They are often drawn up with considerable ability; but they bear the mark, I think, of a single hand, and, though they profess to emanate from public meetings in the different counties of Nova Scotia, they are—I believe, with one exception—signed by the Chairman alone, and give no evidence of the number or the class of the petitioners. As against this, we have to consider, first, that both Upper and Lower Canada have—I may almost say unanimously—expressed their concurrence in the proposed Confederation; and that New Brunswick has given in her formal adhesion. And what as to Nova Scotia? Why, in 1861, the Assembly of that Province agreed to a resolution in favour of Confederation in general terms, and that resolution was transmitted to the Home Government. In 1863 the Nova Scotian Legislature was dissolved, and the Parliament then returned is still in existence. That Parliament, last summer, agreed to a vote in favour of Confederation in most definite and yet comprehensive terms, empowering the delegates now in this country to negotiate with Her Majesty's Government the conditions of Union. My Lords, I do not see how it is possible to look behind that vote, and what better guarantee we can have of the real feelings of the people of Nova Scotia. I cannot, after this, consent to enter upon a discussion of the motives or policy of this or that Colonial Minister. We have not the materials for forming a judgment; we can only accept the deliberate and formal opinion of the Legislature as the expression of the public feeling. Nor are the delegates, who are now in England, men selected from any one party in the Province. They represent both the Colonial Government and the Colonial Opposition. But, then, I may be told that the opposition is not so much to the measure itself as to the time at which it is being passed; and that the opponents desire that its ratification should be deferred until a new Parliament in Nova Scotia shall have expressed its opinion upon the question. But my answer to this must be, that the present Nova Scotian Parliament is fully competent to deal with the subject. Its members are representatives, not delegates, of the constituencies. When, last year, the Legislature of Jamaica voted away the former constitution of the island, Parliament did not hesitate to accept that surrender, and to place the colony under the direct control of the Crown. Neither the people nor the Legislature of Nova Scotia have been taken by surprise. Ever since 1858 the question of a more intimate consolidation of Provincial interests has been before the public mind. The plea for delay is in reality a plea for indefinite postponement, and to this I do not believe that Parliament will lend its ear. This measure has been purchased at the cost of great personal and local interests, and if we now remit it—I care not on what pretence—to the further consideration of the Province, we deliberately invite opposition; and we may be sure that many years will pass over before another such proposal for Confederation is submitted to Parliament.

My Lords, these objections come too late, for it is not the question of one, but of four great Provinces. If, indeed, we were to wait till every individual in those Provinces were agreed, we might wait for ever. To such a scheme as this there must, in the nature of things, be opposition. If ever the union of two countries was of public benefit, it was the union of Scotland and England; and yet when every circumstance of the time called imperatively for that union there were many who hesitated. The calmest and most philosophic of modern historians has said that—

"The measure was so hazardous an experiment that every lover of his country must have consented to it in trembling, or revolted from it in disgust."

That union was, nevertheless, accomplished, and so fraught with blessings has it been, that we now wonder that the two nations could so long have remained separate.

I have thus stated some of the principal objections which have been urged to this measure, and have briefly indicated the answers to them. Let me now review some of the advantages which may be reasonably anticipated. And first, I hope that this measure may well and effectually compose some of those complaints which from time to time must arise out of such an union as that which at present subsists between Upper and Lower Canada. It has, for instance, been said, that whilst Upper Canada possesses the largest population, she has only an equal voice in the representation of their common interests in the joint Legislature. But this inequality will be redressed by the principle of representation according to population, upon which the House of Commons is to be constituted. Nor will Upper Canada gain unduly by this arrangement; for whilst her interests will be protected by a representation in accordance with population in the Lower House, the interests of Lower Canada will be guarded by an equality of the sectional votes in the Upper House. Again, it has been said that whilst Upper Canada contributes the larger share of taxation, Lower Canada enjoys more than her just portion of the public expenditure. That allegation, whether well or ill-founded, also finds its answer in this Bill. Henceforward, apart from the revenue raised for the common purposes of the Confederation, local taxation and expenditure will depend upon the local authorities. Thus, all those complaints which must arise under the circumstances of such an union as that which now exists—complaints of partiality, of neglect, of mismanagement of roads, bridges, and those public works which are the very life of a young community, must cease. All local works will devolve upon local authorities, who in turn will be responsible to the taxpayers. This is, indeed, the principle which we recognise in the management of our own county and borough affairs; and if it should be said that Parliament undertakes a wider control in England than is contemplated by this Bill in the confederated Provinces, I reply first, that there is a difference in the management of local affairs by a central body between a country which contains 100,000 square miles, and one which now contains 400,000, and may one day contain 3,400,000 square miles; and, secondly, that the lesson, which the English Parliament affords us in this matter, is a lesson rather of warning than of encouragement. These are perhaps negative merits. For the positive advantages, let anyone look at the map and observe how bountifully nature has lavished her gifts upon that country. But nature, true to her constant rule, does not there shower those gifts upon one part to the exclusion of another. In the Eastern districts there are not only coasts indented with harbours and fisheries, which, unless man greatly misuse them, may be called inexhaustible, but minerals, gold, and—that which is more precious than gold—rich beds of coal. As the traveller goes westward, he finds a country rich in timber, in grain, in iron, lead, and copper, a country well fitted for manufacturing prosperity, and already known for its breed of sheep, and cattle, and horses; and when he passes the westernmost frontier of Canada, he sees before him fertile plains as yet unsettled, stretching along the valley of the Saskatchewan, up to the roots of the rocky mountains. Now these districts, which it may almost be said that nature designed as one, men have divided into many by artificial lines of separation. The Maritime Provinces need the agricultural products and the manufacturing skill of Canada, and Canada needs harbours on the coast and a connection with the sea. That connection, indeed, she has, during the summer, by one of the noblest highways that a nation could desire, the broad stream of the St. Lawrence; but in winter henceforth she will have it by the intercolonial railway. At present there is but a scanty interchange of the manufacturing, mining, and agricultural resources of these several Provinces. They stand to each other almost in the relation of foreign States. Hostile Custom Houses guard the frontiers, and adverse tariffs choke up the channels of intercolonial trade. There is no uniformity of banking, no common system of weights and measures, no identity of postal arrangements. The very currencies differ. In Canada the pound or the dollar are legal tender. In Nova Scotia the Peruvian, Mexican, Columbian dollars are all legal; in New Brunswick, British and American coins are recognised by law, though I believe that the shilling is taken at twenty-four cents, which is less than its value; in Newfoundland Peruvian, Mexican, Columbian, old Spanish dollars, are all equally legal; whilst in Prince Edward's Island the complexity of currencies and of their relative value is even greater. Such then being the case, I can hardly understand that any one should seriously dispute the advantage of consolidating these different resources, and interests, and incidents of government under one common and manageable system.

But there is yet another advantage to be gained from that union, to which I must call the attention of the House. The question of military defence is a somewhat delicate one on which to touch. Military defence supposes war, and war in that part of the world could only be with that great Republic which lies south of our border. Such a war between men of a common race and language, and in many respects of common institutions, would be an unnatural and detestable conflict, which would entail upon each incalculable injuries, and perhaps throw back for years the course of civilization and human prosperity. It is, however, our duty in dealing with this great question to deal with it fully, and not to evade a consideration so important as that of military defence. We are constantly reminded of the difficulties of defending the long frontier of Canada with a distant base of operations. Every reasonable man will admit those difficulties; nor do I see any object in underrating them. At the same time, we have high and competent military authority to warrant us in believing that, with proper precautions and with the spirit of courage and loyalty which has animated the Canadian people, the defence of Canada is no insoluble problem. Again, we are told that the proportions of military expenditure are not fairly adjusted between the mother country and Canada. Well, I think that the time has probably come for a re-consideration of those charges; and to that opinion there are many in Canada who will subscribe. I am confident that Canada desires only that which is reasonable, that which she may in honour ask, and in honour accept of this country. There has been a good deal of misunderstanding on this subject, and Canada has been supposed to be backward in defraying the expenses of her own defence. But out of the 425,000 militia who are on paper, 90,000 have six days' drill in the year; and that besides these, there are from 30,000 to 35,000 Volunteers, who have undergone considerable training, and have attained much efficiency. There are drill associations in the various towns;

there have been camps of instruction, and more than 3,000 cadets have within the last two years passed an examination by the military authorities, and have received certificates either of the first or second class. I will only add, that whilst the military expenditure in Canada was in 1864 about 300,000 dollars, it was in 1865 nearly 900,000 dollars, and in 1866 more than 2,000,000 dollars. By the Census of 1861, it was computed that the men between the ages of twenty and sixty, supposed to be capable of bearing arms, were—

In Upper Canada . . .	308,000
„ Lower Canada . . .	225,000
„ Nova Scotia . . .	67,000
„ New Brunswick . . .	51,000
	<hr/> 651,000

These are now fixed to their respective Provinces, and engaged, as a matter both of duty and sentiment, to the exclusive defence of that Province. But when Confederation is accomplished these scattered forces will become one army under the command and, in the event of emergency, at the disposal of one single general.

But if the advantages of union are great in a military, a commercial, a material point of view, they are not, I think, less in the moral and political aspect of the question. When once existing restrictions are removed, and the schools, the law courts, the professions, the industries of these great Provinces are thrown open from one end to another, depend upon it a stimulus greater than any that has ever been known before in British North America will be applied to every form of mental or moral energy. Nor will it be the main body of the people that will alone feel this. The tone of Parliament, the standard of the Government will necessarily rise. Colonial institutions are framed upon the model of England. But English institutions, as we all know, need to be of a certain size. Public opinion is the basis of Parliamentary life; and the first condition of public opinion is that it should move in no contracted circle. It would not be difficult to show that almost in proportion to its narrowness Colonial Governments have been subject to disturbing influences. But now, independently of the fact that in these confederated Provinces there will henceforth be a larger material whence an adequate supply of colonial administrations and colonial oppositions can be drawn, it is not, I think, unreasonable to hope that, just as the sphere of action is enlarged.

the vestry element will be discarded, large questions will be discussed with the gravity which belongs to them, men will rise to a full sense of their position as Members of a great Parliament, and will transmit their own sense of increased responsibility and self-respect through Parliament and the Government to the main body of the people.

My Lords, I have now touched upon the main features of this measure. I have only in conclusion to say a few words as to the principle upon which it is founded. I know that objections are sometimes made to the principle of a federative Government. It is true that no federation can be as compact as a single homogeneous State, though the compactness will vary with the strength or weakness of the Central Government. It is true that federation may be comparatively a loose bond, but the alternative is no bond at all. It is not every nation, or every stage of the national existence, that admits of a federative Government. Federation is only possible under certain conditions, when the States to be federated are so far akin that they can be united, and yet so far dissimilar that they cannot be fused into one single body politic. And this I believe to be the present condition of the Provinces of British North America. Again, it is said that federation is a compromise, and, like all compromises, contains the germ of future disunion. It is true that it is a compromise, so far as it is founded upon the consent of the Provinces; it is true that it has been rendered possible by the surrender of certain powers, rights, and pretensions by the several Provinces into the hands of the central authority; but it is also to be remembered that—unlike every other federation that has existed—it derives its political existence from an external authority, from that which is the recognised source of power and right—the British Crown. And I cannot but recognise in this some security against those conflicts of State rights and central authority which in other federations have sometimes proved so disastrous.

There have been but few examples of federative Governments. Republics and kingdoms there have been many that have played great parts; but the federative Governments in the world's history may be easily counted. There have been but four which can be fairly called famous. Two are no more—two exist. Of these, one—Switzerland—is the smallest amongst the families of modern Europe; the other—the United States—is one of the greatest of the Great Powers of the world. In geographical area this Confederation of the British North American Provinces is even now large—it may become one day second only in extent to the vast territories of Russia—and in population, in revenue, in trade, in shipping, it is superior to the thirteen colonies when, not a century ago, in the Declaration of Independence, they became the United States of America. We are laying the foundation of a great State—perhaps one which at a future day may even overshadow this country. But, come what may, we shall rejoice that we have shown neither indifference to their wishes nor jealousy of their aspirations, but that we honestly and sincerely, to the utmost of our power and knowledge, fostered their growth, recognising in it the conditions of our own greatness. We are in this measure setting the crown to the free institutions which more than a quarter of a century ago we gave them, and therein we remove, as I firmly believe, all possibilities of future jealousy or misunderstanding—

"Magna sub ingenti Matris se subiecit umbrâ."

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies had so exhausted the subject that it was unnecessary to add but a few remarks to what had been said already. He should, therefore, confine his observations to the military advantages which he believed this union was calculated to confer on the North American Provinces, and answer some of the objections that had been made to the scheme in Nova Scotia. Some people in this country were of opinion that England derived no benefit from these colonies; that they were rather a source of burden and expense, and that there was consequently no need for maintaining the close connection at present existing between them and the mother country. That was not the feeling with which he intended to address himself to this subject; nor was it the feeling of the vast majority of the people in this country, nor of their Lordships, nor of the colonists themselves. Were the British North American colonies in a position to stand alone—were they anxious or willing for separation from this country, were their feelings or inclinations such as to lead them to seek amalgamation with the United States—he did not think that it would be wise for us to use coercive measures to prevent them. But so long as they were loyal—so long as they looked upon their connection with the mother country and the institutions which they at present enjoyed under her rule as among the greatest blessings they possessed, he believed it was their duty to encourage the feeling and protect their rights and interests to the best of their power. It was perfectly true that in a pecuniary point of view this country derived no profit from her colonies. While in a generous spirit granting them free institutions, and confiding to their own hands the distribution of their revenues and the management of their local affairs, we had up to the present time taken upon ourselves entirely the burden of providing for their defence. It was, however, to be borne in mind that this country had no longer the power, even if she had the will, to provide for such defence. The change in locomotion had so altered North America that it would be impossible to act in this matter now as we had formerly done. He had heard it asserted that Canada could not be defended, but he did not believe it. The colonists were perfectly ready to co-operate with us, and so long as this country maintained her naval supremacy, no fear need be entertained with regard to the maintenance of the coast defences of that colony. The principal enemy Canada would have to fear would be the United States; but he hoped no quarrel would arise to bring the two countries into collision. Every man must cordially hope that war might not arise between the States and this country. Such a war would produce unmitigated evils, and would, in fact, be nothing less than suicidal. But, at the same time, they could not disguise from themselves that the condition of the United States had greatly altered within the last few years. Not long ago her army consisted only of some 10,000 men, but she had now an enormous and well-disciplined force. It therefore well became us to consider how we could best provide for the defences of our British North American Provinces; and he thought it was clear that in no way could these be better provided for than by their union. It might be fairly argued that what had been done in one Province could be done in another. Some account, therefore, of what had been done and what was capable of being done in one at least of our North American Provinces might not be uninteresting. When he first assumed the government of Nova Scotia, in 1858, the entire local force of that country consisted of some fifty or sixty Volunteer artillerymen. Subsequently an opportunity presented itself of raising Volunteer Corps, and at a later period circumstances enabled him to obtain a revision of the militia laws. In 1863, when he left that Province, there were no less than 34,800 men regularly enrolled for drill for five days every year, and since that time matters had greatly improved. Last year there were, he believed, 59,000 men regularly out for drill. He admitted the insufficiency of the drill of these men, but their organization was perfect, their enrolment was good, and their officers effectively trained, being required in every case to pass an examination before receiving their commissions. If Nova Scotia, with a population of 300,000, could produce 50,000 militiamen, he could see no reason why British North America, with a population of 4,000,000, should not produce an enrolled militia of 400,000 or 500,000. Of these a quota could be called out every year for permanent training, so as to keep up the organization of the entire body. With such a force to draw upon in case of need, backed by the support which would be given by this country, there was no reason why Canada should not be able to defend herself effectually. It must be borne in mind that in Canada any campaign must, owing to the necessities of the climate, be limited to six months; moreover, as war with Canada meant war with England, America would be obliged to keep a large force at home for the protection of her own shores. In speaking thus of America he alluded, of course, only to possibilities. No one was more sensible than himself of the serious disadvantages of a war with America; no one could deplore more than he did the miseries which such a war was calculated to entail; and nobody could look with greater interest on the institutions of that country, or entertain a higher sense of her greatness and resources. Turning now to the political part of the question, he would notice some objections that had been urged against the scheme. As regarded Canada and New Brunswick, the importance of the measure now advocated could not be over-estimated. In both these Provinces the proposal for union had been so universally accepted that it was unnecessary to dilate upon it as regarded them. The case of Nova Scotia was, however, he was sorry to say, different. Petitions had been drawn up against the scheme, and delegates had been sent over to this country to oppose it. This was the more unreasonable when it was considered that the Maritime Provinces, of which Nova Scotia was one, would derive more benefit from the Confederation than the Canadas themselves. He was one of those who thought originally, and still thought, that it might have been better in the first instance to have formed a separate federation of the Maritime Provinces, by which means time would have been allowed for the softening down of local jealousies, and the way prepared for the eventual formation of a large and compact body. But the question was not now whether there should be a more limited or more extended union, but whether we should have the union at present proposed, or allow the North American Provinces to remain disunited. They were told that nine-tenths of the population of Nova Scotia were against this measure, and that 30,000 signatures had been appended to petitions praying that it should not be carried out. Pamphlets had been published by the opponents to the scheme that it would, if carried out, cause great misery, and ultimately the ruin of Nova Scotia. Their Lordships should bear in mind, however, that it was not an unusual thing across the Atlantic to hear political questions argued in a tone and temper that sounded strangely to the ear, and to see people rather carried away by the force of language than by the arguments conveyed in their language. He had had some experience of the way in which the petitions were got up in Nova Scotia against this measure. When the movement in favour of Confederation gained strength, a gentleman, whom he respected on account of his talents, put himself at the head of a party of opposition and went through the country holding meetings for the purpose of declaiming against the scheme. Nothing is easier than to persuade people they are about to be wronged, that they are to be deprived of their liberties and have their commercial prosperity retarded; so the people responded to the agitation and petitioned against this scheme in vast numbers; but he thought the petitions represented the opinion of the agitators rather than the real feeling of the inhabitants of the country. The arguments of the party of opposition were not directed particularly against this measure, but against all union of our North American Provinces; and the head of the party, it should be stated, was once as much in favour of Confederation as he had latterly been against it; so that his arguments could not be counted of much worth. If it were true that Nova Scotia was likely to be sacrificed for the benefit of Canada he would not lend his support to the Bill; but it was clear that, as the interests of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were identical, and as those two States possessed a third of the votes of the Senate and a fifth of the House of Commons, they would surely be able, by joining with the ordinary opposition, to obtain a hearing and compel the House to do them justice. If the question were one merely affecting the interests of Nova Scotia the case might be different; but it also affected the interests of the two Canadas, New Brunswick, and this country. Their Lordships were therefore bound to consider the matter not in a local but an Imperial point of view. He believed that the Bill would promote the general good of the British North American Provinces, and he would therefore give it his support.

EARL RUSSELL said, he could not altogether remain silent when a subject of such interest as this engaged their Lordships' attention. It appeared to him that the measure was undoubtedly a wise one. In the first place, the Confederation would facilitate commercial relations with the United States, because it would be far easier for our North American Provinces, when united together, to form agreements which might afterwards be put into treaties than if they were to remain separate. In the second place, it was far better to have a single united authority which could provide for any exigencies that might arise, such as war, than to have the defence left to the separate colonies. In supporting the Bill he must say that the creation of these provinces, so populous and wealthy, redounded greatly to the credit of this country. In 1760, when we obtained Canada by capitulation from the French, there were only 70,000 inhabitants in the colony. At the present day the descendants of the French in Lower Canada alone amounted to nearly 1,000,000, and in Upper Canada the population was 1,500,000. The total population of the Provinces which it was proposed to unite was no less than 4,000,000. He believed that there was no other instance in the history of the world of such a noble colony springing from so small a source. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had said rightly that the measure of Confederation had been long thought of. Lord Durham, in his Report, suggested a similar project; and he remembered speaking about it to Sir James Kemp, at the time Governor of Nova Scotia, who told him that whatever might be its advantages, the difficulty of communication between Upper and Lower Canada was such that it was impossible at that time to entertain the proposal. The difficulty of communication between Canada and New Brunswick which had hitherto existed would be removed by the intercolonial railway which the Provinces had undertaken to construct, and which was to be guaranteed by this country. He believed that that question was to be brought forward in the other House, for the consent of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the federation was dependent upon it, and without it the union could not be carried out. He had to express his regret that this was not a legislative instead of a confederate union. He feared that separate local Legislatures would be attended with great inconvenience, and that the work of the Confederation could only be done by a single Legislature. He hoped that in time the leading men of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would see that it was better to rule over 4,000,000 of people than to be restricted to the Government of their own Provinces, and that they would themselves propose the legislative union which the noble Earl now confessed himself unable to effect. He sincerely hoped that those united Provinces might continue to improve, and that if, in the course of time, they desired to separate from the mother country, and to become a separate State—a circumstance which he did not think at all likely to occur—they would find, as we had always been ready to defend the Canadians as the subjects of Her Majesty, so we should be ready to listen to their wishes should they desire to separate and to form an independent nation.

LORD MONCK said, he hoped their Lordships would permit him to say a few words upon the Bill, considering the share which he had had in its origination. He would at the outset refer to one thing, which appeared to him of great importance in a constitutional point of view. It had been, he thought, most unwarrantably assumed that the Province of Nova Scotia was opposed to the union. Now, he believed that the expression of opinion which had come from Nova Scotia to this country had been entirely got up by a few energetic individuals; but the Legislature of Nova Scotia had, like the Legislatures of the other Provinces, adopted by large majorities the Resolutions proposed to them, and had sent their delegates to this country to take part in the framing of the measure which had been laid on the table. The demands of those gentlemen in Nova Scotia, if they amounted to anything, meant that the question should be subjected to the decision of the people, instead of its being determined by the people's representatives. Such a demand, to his mind, betrayed a great ignorance, not only of the principles of the British Constitution, but of the principles upon which all representative institutions were founded. It was, perhaps, unnecessary to remind their Lordships that in the earliest period of self-government every man was accustomed to give his opinion on matters on which a decision had to be arrived. But with the increase of communities such a thing became practically impossible. By-and-by, when the expedient of popular elections was adopted, the general body of the people had nothing to do with the management of their affairs beyond selecting men in whose intelligence, integrity, and judgment they could place reliance to do their business for them. But they were not dealing with representative government in the abstract; they were acting under the British Constitution, which provided no machinery for testing the opinions of the country upon a measure. Responsible Ministers would scarcely recommend the Crown, for instance, to dissolve the House of Commons when the three Estates of the realm were in harmony. They would have, he believed, no right to look to any further expression of opinion. Therefore, he did not think that those gentlemen had any right to dispute the decision of the constitutionally appointed Legislature, but that, as the Legislature had decided in favour of the union, they were bound to accept their decision as final. But that was not the first time that such a point had been raised. It was raised in reference to the union with Ireland, and Mr. Pitt denounced in the strongest terms any attempt of the kind as a dangerous constitutional precedent. It was also suggested in 1846 that Sir Robert Peel should dissolve the House of Commons in order to ascertain the opinion of the people on the proposed repeal of the Corn Laws, and the proposition was treated by him in a similar manner.

Such a proposition was, in reality, little short of revolutionary. He would not trouble their Lordships with any arguments derived from the benefits which were likely to accrue to the colonies themselves from the proposed change, as the subject had been so ably dwelt upon by the noble Earl who had introduced the measure now under consideration. He did, however, wish to refer to one point about which he could bear personal testimony, and that was the embarrassment which would every now and then attend the conduct of our foreign relations if the colonies remained in their present disunited state. These colonies had so much increased in trade, in wealth, and in commerce that, taking into consideration also their peculiar geographical position, they had interests connected with questions of foreign policy, he would not say antagonistic, but, at all events, distinct from those of the mother country. We had, and he thought very wisely, conceded to these Provinces the management of their own affairs, and it would not be politically wise or just to dispose of every matter connected with the foreign relations of these Provinces without consulting the people interested. He confessed, however, to feeling some dismay at the prospect of consulting five distinct Governments, looking at the questions possibly from different and often circumscribed points of view. He did not believe that we should entirely get over the difficulty by the union of the Provinces; but by having one colony to consult, instead of five, the disadvantage would certainly be reduced to a minimum. A noble Earl had alluded to the present scheme as a confederation, and had stated that he would rather have had a legislative union. The weakness of a confederate union was generally supposed to reside in the absence of sufficient authority in the central power. But not one of the sources of weakness of Federal union was to be found in this Confederation. The union was not created by the act of the States themselves—the supreme authority and the executive authority were both to be possessed by the central power, and for all purposes of union the central Government acted directly through its own officers upon the people of the united Provinces. The central power also reserved to itself the complete control over the legislative, the executive, and the judicial authorities. As there was no opposition to the measure, there was but little further for him to say, except that he believed that this union would conduce to the good government of these Provinces; would render the relations between the mother country and the colonies more satisfactory; and would place the colonies on such a footing that, in the event of their ever being desirous of severing that connection, they would be enabled to choose their future position in the world regardless of any external disturbing influences, and to make their own arrangements in harmony with their own wishes and feelings.

LORD LYVEDEN regarded the Confederation as being most advantageous both for this country and for the American Government. He wished to ask the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) whether, by the terms of the arrangements that had been come to, Parliament was precluded from making any alteration in the terms of this Bill; and whether, in the event of it being possible to make any alteration in those terms, it would not be advisable that the salary of the Governor General should be paid by the mother country instead of by money to be voted by the Colonial Legislature?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, by the 105th clause of the Bill, the salary of the Governor General was to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund of the united Provinces. It was, of course, within the competence of Parliament to alter the provisions of the Bill; but he should be glad for the House to understand that the Bill partook somewhat of the nature of a treaty of union, every single clause in which had been debated over and over again, and had been submitted to the closest scrutiny, and, in fact, each of them represented a compromise between the different interests involved. Nothing could be more fatal to the Bill than that any of those clauses, which were the result of a compromise, should be subject to much alteration. Of course, there might be alterations where they were not material, and did not go to the essence of the measure, and he should be quite ready to consider any Amendments that might be proposed by the noble Lord in Committee. But it would be his duty to resist the alteration of anything which was in the nature of a compromise, and which, if carried, would be fatal to the measure.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock,

LAW OF MORTMAIN.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been directed to the great number of institutions raised by voluntary contributions in England having property affected by the law of mortmain, and held by trustees or a trustee for religious, charitable, literary, scientific, educational, and other useful purposes; and, whether he will bring in a Bill to cheapen and facilitate the mode of transferring trust property so held and any other trust property held therewith to new trustees or a new trustee, either alone or jointly with continuing trustees or a continuing trustee; also, to enable trustees of such institutions to sue and be sued corporately in respect of their trusts; and also so to modify the operation of the law of mortmain as to diminish the expense of founding such institutions by voluntary contributions?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that the first part of the Question of the hon. Member related to facilitating and cheapening the appointment of new trustees to charitable institutions, and the transfer of the trust estate to new trustees. He (the Attorney General) quite admitted the importance of the subject, although he could not undertake to bring in a Bill with respect to it. He would, however, give the matter early consideration, with a view, if possible, to introduce some useful legislation in that direction. As to allowing a trustee to act in a corporate capacity, he could not think that advisable, and therefore he was not prepared to introduce a Bill with respect to it. The same answer applied to the third Question.

CAPTAIN DESLANDES OF THE "ANNE."

QUESTION.

MR. GUINNESS said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been directed to the particulars of certain charges made to the Local Marine Board of Liverpool on the 18th of December last against Captain Gordon Deslandes, of the ship Anne, for gross drunkenness while in charge of the said ship?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied, that the attention of the Board of Trade had been called to the fact by the Local Marine Board of Liverpool, but it rested with the Local Marine Board to decide. There had been a correspondence between them and the Board of Trade, and he should have no objection to the production of those papers.

TRADE IN ANIMALS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Privy Council, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure this Session to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee on Trade in Animals?

MR. CORRY, in reply, said, a Bill was in the course of preparation to regulate the trade in and the removal of animals in Great Britain, and he hoped to be able to introduce it before long.

ARMY—MEDICAL OFFICERS OF THE BRIGADE OF GUARDS.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What compensation, if any, has been offered to those Medical Officers of the Brigade of Guards whose prospects have been seriously damaged by the alteration of their system of promotion, under a Warrant framed in 1860, but not promulgated till 1866?

GENERAL PEEL, in reply, said, the arrangement which the noble Marquess the late Secretary of State for War had made previous to the present Government taking office, and which he (General Peel) saw no reason to alter, was that the Warrant of 1860 should be carried into force, and promotion was to be in the brigade, and not in any particular regiment. If a vacancy occurred the senior assistant-surgeon of the Guards would be promoted in the Guards.

ORNAMENTAL WATERS IN THE PARKS.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, having in view the recent lamentable loss of life in the Regent's Park, it is intended to lessen the depth in the ornamental waters of the Public Parks; and, if so, to what depth it is proposed to reduce them?

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied, that it was intended to reduce the depth of water in the lake in the Regent's Park to four feet. As to the ornamental water of the other parks, he was not at that moment in a condition to say what steps would be taken.

IRELAND—REFORM BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it be the intention of the Government to introduce a Reform Bill for Ireland this Session?

LORD NAAS: I think, Sir, that the wisest course which the Government and the House can take is to wait and see what is done as regards the representation of the people in England and Wales before it proceeds to discuss the question of Irish representation.

INSPECTION OF COLLIERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWARDS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he proposes to introduce any measure during the present Session to secure the more efficient inspection of Collieries and their workings, with the view of preventing the recurrence of such lamentable sacrifice of life as attended the late accidents at Barnsley and elsewhere?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that last Session there was appointed upon this subject a Select Committee which did not complete its inquiry. As soon as the recent lamentable accidents occurred he directed the Inspectors to meet in order to see if they could make any suggestions that would be of use in the further investigations of that Select Committee. He had further directed two Inspectors, Messrs. Blackwell and Dickenson, to report upon the two recent lamentable accidents. He had received the Report of one, but he had not received that of the other. He proposed to refer both Reports to the Select Committee when it was re-appointed. Until that Committee made its Report it would be premature to give a more definite answer to the Question.

THE SHIP "TORNADO."—QUESTION.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any reply has been received to the letter addressed by him to Sir John Crampton, dated 8th February, instructing him to demand the immediate release of the crew of the Tornado?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, last night I received a telegram to the effect that forty-five of the crew of the Tornado had been liberated, and that seven officers and one seaman still remained in custody; but I have not yet received any explanation of the cause of the distinction being made between those who were liberated and those who were still kept in custody.

SCOTLAND—POOR LAW.—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, MR. WALPOLE said, the Law Officers of the Crown were considering the subject of a more economical administration of the Poor Law in Scotland with a view to frame a Bill on the subject.

CATTLE PLAGUE IN CHESHIRE.

QUESTION.

MR. TOLLEMACHE said, that a deputation had lately waited upon the Privy Council to make certain representations on the subject of compensation for cattle which had been slaughtered in consequence of the plague. The noble Duke the President of the Council was absent, but the Vice President and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade were present on the occasion. The case of Cheshire was represented to his right hon. Friends, and they were informed that owing to peculiar circumstances very few cattle were slaughtered in that county by order of the Inspector, though the county had suffered enormously from the plague, and the consequence was that the sufferers received scarcely any compensation, which was certainly a great hardship in their case. His right hon. Friend promised that he would communicate with his Colleagues on the subject, and he wished to ask now, Whether the right hon. Gentleman had done so; and, if so, what was their answer?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, the question as to whether compensation should be given for animals slaughtered at different periods in consequence of the cattle plague had several times been under the consideration of the Government; and he was aware, in a general way, of the arrangements which had been come to some months ago upon this matter. As it was one, however, which had not been particularly under the notice of his Department, he was not exactly aware of the position in which the question stood when he received a request yesterday to come into the Privy Council Office to meet a deputation to the Lord President which, owing to illness, the Lord President was not able to receive. He there found his hon. Friend (Mr. Tollemache), several other Members of that House, and many gentlemen of high standing from Cheshire. They stated in full the claims of Cheshire for compensation in respect of carcases which had been buried under Orders of Council, to the loss of any possible profit which might have been made from them between the Order of the 23rd of November and the passing of the Act of last Session. The case was stated extremely well, and it was shown that the inhabitants of Cheshire had suffered a very severe calamity which had fallen upon them particularly during this period. Under these circumstances, they not unnaturally came to the Government to know whether anything could be done to compensate them for that loss. He gave the only answer which he could at the time—that he would state the case to his Colleagues and lose no time in doing so. On coming to this House, accordingly, he communicated with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other Members of the Cabinet, and he found that the mind of the Government had not been altered since the matter was discussed before. It appeared impossible, therefore, to give the compensation for which the deputation applied. He had no doubt the Lord President of the Council would send an answer to the memorial which had been addressed to him.

AFFAIRS OF CRETE.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received information from the British Consuls in Crete that the stipulations contained in the Hatti-Sheriff of 1856 and in the Hatti-Humayoun have been observed by the Turkish Government towards the Christian Inhabitants of the Island; and, if no information on the subject has reached him, whether he will cause inquiry to be made from each Consular Agent?

Sir Stafford Northcote

LORD STANLEY: All the information, Sir, which the Foreign Office possesses upon the special subject to which the hon. Gentleman's Question refers has already been laid upon the table of the House. I do not think much will be found in those papers bearing upon this particular Question. But in consequence of observations made in the late debate, I thought it right to cause search to be made in the records of the Office to see whether any Reports bearing upon the subject have been addressed to the Office within the last two years. When that search is completed, if I find anything bearing on the present state of things in Crete to justify its production, I shall lay it on the table.

DOCKYARDS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. SEELY rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the control and management of the Dockyards is inefficient, and that the inefficiency may be attributed to the following causes:—

1st. The constitution of the Board of Admiralty;

2nd. The defective organization of the subordinate departments;

3rd. The want of clear and well-defined responsibility."

He had been induced to bring this Motion before the House because he believed there was a general feeling throughout the country that the organization of this Department was very defective, and that opinion was shared by men of business in that House who had experience of the management of large establishments. He had been strengthened in his wish to bring this matter before the House in consequence of the Report of the Royal Commission, which had attributed the inefficiency of which he complained to the causes embraced in his Resolution. That there was a want of responsibility would scarcely be questioned by any man. When the most competent authorities—men who had held the post of First Lord of the Admiralty—differed as to what were the powers and duties of the office, what must be thought of the matter? He would give the House one or two quotations in illustration of what he had stated. The Duke of Somerset, in his evidence before the Committee of 1861, which had been appointed to inquire into the subject, was reported, page 28, to have said—

"I consider that the First Lord is responsible for the whole administration of the navy" . . . "as the Secretary of State is considered to be responsible for his own department, and I believe this". . . "has been the understanding of all former First Lords."

But the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington), who was examined before the same Committee, was of an entirely opposite opinion. At page 179 it would be found that he said—

"I do think that the system of administration of the Admiralty is not satisfactory, &c." . . . "I never did feel at the Admiralty that I had either the knowledge, or the control, or the responsibility which I think the Minister who is at the head of so great a Department ought to have."

And at page 25 he said—

"I avow my distrust of the Board of Admiralty as a means of governing such a department as the Navy."

And at page 195 he said—

"The responsibility of the First Lord in departmental" . . . "matters is rather a theoretical than a real responsibility," and "where six gentlemen sit round a table there is, unavoidably, a tendency to lean upon each other. . . . There is that theoretical responsibility of which we have heard so much, but my sincere belief is that there is a want and an absence on the part of any one member of that Board of that sense of individual responsibility—that feeling that upon my conduct hangs the decision of whether a given course is or is not to be taken, or whether a given thing is to be well done or not well done—upon which sense of responsibility I think the satisfactory conduct of public business mainly depends."

With reference to the Junior Lords, the right hon. Baronet was asked whether his opinion applied to them also?—and his reply was—

"My opinion is that it is very difficult to say what the responsibility of the Junior Lords is, and, I may almost add, it is doubtful whether they have any."

The Civil Lord was supposed to superintend the accounts, but the Duke of Somerset, when asked whether more authority was exercised by that member of the Board in this department than by his colleagues, replied in the negative. A previous First Lord, Viscount Halifax, stated that the Accountant General was under the Civil Lord; and when asked whether the accounts would be under his superintendence, so far as the Accountant General had the cash accounts, he replied, "Just so." As to the Controller, his duties were extremely onerous and important, for he had to draw the designs for ships, whether those built in the Royal Dockyards or in private yards, to inspect works in progress, and, in fact, to control the management of the 17,000 or 18,000 artificers and workmen employed in the seven dockyards; and he had besides various other duties. The Royal Commissioners of 1860 reported that the Royal Dockyards ought to be regarded as manufacturing establishments, and that the Controller of the Navy should be practically acquainted with and qualified to manage such establishments; and the Duke of Somerset, while objecting to that view, admitted that if it were adopted a civilian would have to be appointed as Controller General. The Board, however, ignored that Report altogether, and laid down the strict and rigid rule that the Controller must be a naval officer. Now, what he (Mr. Seely) contended for was, that all the ability to be found in the country should be made available for the public service, and that the best man should be appointed Controller, whether he were a naval officer or a civilian. Admiral Walker, who had filled that position, when examined before the Commission, stated that though he was supposed to be responsible for a ship being properly adapted in all its parts, he was really guided by his officers; and Lord Clarence Paget remarked that the Controller not being a practical man must necessarily be guided by the officers under him. The recommendation of the Commissioners was evidently in accordance with common sense; yet the Duke of Somerset told the Committee of 1861 that there were a thousand reasons against a civilian being Controller. He only, however, stated one, which he probably thought the strongest, leaving the 999 locked up in his breast, and that reason was that all the fittings, ventilation, stowage, and comfort of a ship were under his superintendence, and that a naval officer would be better able to look after those things than a civilian. One would have supposed that the speed, strength, and offensive and defensive power of a vessel were the matters of primary importance; and he (Mr. Seely) submitted, moreover, that even the points to which the noble Duke gave priority would be as well attended to by a civilian as by a naval officer. The noble Duke seemed to proceed on the assumption that the man who used a thing must necessarily be the best man to make it; but according to such logic everybody ought to be his own architect and his own shoemaker. Moreover, naval officers had not been particularly successful with regard to these very details; for Rear Admiral G. Elliot, who informed the Committee of 1861 that ships' fittings were very defective, and that two years previously a Committee over which he presided had unanimously reported

“strongly condemning the dangerous position of the magazines, and referring to previous reports of the same description,” and he attributed the disregard by the Admiralty of this and former reports of the same character “to be entirely owing to the constitution of the Board, including the Controller’s office.” Another rule insisted on by the Admiralty was that the person filling the office ought to be frequently changed, and the reason given by the Duke of Somerset was that he ought not to remain in office more than seven or eight years, certainly not more than ten, because with the change there was more probability of improvements being effected. Yet the noble Duke acknowledged that it was undesirable to change the heads of departments, such as the store-keeper, in a similar manner, for that this would put them completely in the hands of their chief clerks. Now, surely the same objection applied to the Controller, and if he were an efficient officer the longer he remained in the service—of course with certain limitations—the better would he be able to fulfil its duties. It was much more difficult, too, to obtain a competent successor for so important a post, than for that of Storekeeper General. The test of good management being the production of articles of the best quality at a reasonable cost, a Controller who knew his business instead of being opposed to improvement would be anxious to adopt every real improvement in order to make his vessels as powerful and effective as possible. It might be said that he had assistants, such as the Chief Constructor, but knowledge ought to proceed from the higher to the lower officers, and not from the lower to the higher. With regard to the Controller, one important part of his duty was the visiting and the management of the dockyards; but the Duke of Somerset in Report 1860, p. 22, said, “It is impossible for the Controller to leave London,” his business requiring his daily attention in London. It might be asked what assistance the Controller received. As the Royal Commissioners reported that he was responsible for the work in the yards it might be supposed he would have the power of appointing the best men he could get; and in their Report they expressed the opinion that as the Controller was responsible he ought to have the power (subject to the approval of the Minister) of appointing the Superintendents of the dockyards, who were the instruments for carrying out his instructions. The Board of Admiralty, however, paid no attention to this recommendation; and the Duke of Somerset, in his evidence before the Royal Commissioners, expressed an opinion that it would be a great misfortune so far to place the Superintendents under the Controller. They were, he said, now able to communicate with the First Lord or any other member of the Board, and that was to some extent a check upon the Controller. Now, as the Superintendents were the agents of the Controller, this appeared to be scarcely fair and generous—such a course would not be pursued by men of business. The Board of Admiralty had never carried out the recommendation of the Commissioners, and insisted that the Superintendent should be a naval officer. The Duke of Somerset gave as a reason for this that the captain of every ship fitted out wanted some alterations, and a naval officer could best understand what was wanted. It was rather a libel upon the naval profession to say that every captain wanted some alteration to be made in the fitting out of his ship. He did not believe that every naval officer would demand such alterations, nor did he believe that a naval officer in the position of the Superintendent was the best person to protect the public. No doubt, there was a master shipwright, a master smith, and other head officers, who could assist the Superintendent, if a naval officer, in shipbuilding; but the Superintendent having no practical knowledge could not decide, for instance, between the master shipwright and the master engineer if they differed. Some of these officers were exceedingly clever, and what was wanted was a head—some one to whom they could appeal if they differed. Sir Michael Seymour stated that when he was Superintendent of Devonport Dockyard in 1854 certain works were in abeyance for ten years in consequence of a disagreement between the dockyard authorities and the Board of Works. Practically, the Superintendents were changed every two or three years, before it was possible for them to become interested in the efficiency of their dockyard, and the results were disastrous. If a manufacturer well acquainted with his business left it for six or eight months he had some difficulty in taking up the thread of his work; and still more difficult was it for a Superintendent to become acquainted with what was passing in a dockyard with which he had little or no direct acquaintance. There were six Lords of the Admiralty, who had no practical knowledge; one Controller, who could not leave London; and one Superintendent, who knew even less than the Controller. Was it likely that a business so superintended could answer? Would any Member of that House get up and defend the system on which dockyard management was conducted? Would any manufacturer or man of business defend such a system? The country was gradually getting rid of Boards. The India Board and the Ordnance Board had been swept away, and the general feeling of the country was against them. There was no public Department on which so many Committees had sat as the Admiralty. In 1859 a Committee to inquire if any improvement could be made in dockyards was appointed by the Lords of the Admiralty. It consisted of Rear Admiral Smart, Mr. Chatfield, master shipwright; Mr. Andrew Murray, chief engineer; Mr. Robert Laws, storekeeper; and Mr. Robert Bowman, civil engineer. This Committee examined 173 witnesses, 172 of whom were or had been paid officials of the Admiralty, and only one an independent witness. In August, 1859, they reported—the only dissenting member of the Committee being Mr. Chatfield—

“The Committee feel from their own observations that the remark made in the circular, issued by the Board, in February, 1847, that ‘the quantity of work done in the dockyards is below the standard of well-conducted private establishments’ is still applicable; and it was evident to the Committee that before this can be remedied material alteration will require to be made in the system under which the works in the dockyards are conducted. There was an apathy and want of activity and energy pervading many of the supervising officers, and many of the men, apparent in the dockyards, and that no code of rules for the management of such large bodies of men can be made so complete as to enable an inefficient or inactive professional officer at the head of a department to carry it on properly, as if they were personally supervised by an active, energetic, practical officer.”

A Royal Commission was afterwards appointed to inquire into the control and management of the dockyards. They examined seventy witnesses, all of whom were or had been officials, except two. They reported—and he (Mr. Seely) had adopted that portion of their Report—

“We regret to state that, in our opinion, the control and management of the dockyards is inefficient, and that the inefficiency may be attributed to the following causes:—1. The constitution of the Board of Admiralty; 2. The defective organization of the subordinate departments; 3.

The want of clear and well-defined responsibility; 4. The absence of any means, both now and in times past, of effectually checking expenditure, from the want of accurate accounts.”

Well, notwithstanding the general opinion throughout the country—notwithstanding that the system had been condemned by the Reports of Committees, and by the opinion of men of business, still, if the Admiralty would point to results, and say “we challenge you on the results,” that would be something. But this was just what the Admiralty could not do. Year after year there were complaints of the accounts, next that the work was expensive, and thirdly that the fleet was inefficient. What reason could there be for all this delay in the accounts? He admitted there were certain principles recognised in keeping accounts, and they might be made perfect as regarded all the practical issues involved without waiting for six or seven years. Sir James Graham, who was examined before the Committee of 1861, said—

“I am perfectly satisfied—as I stated the other day after hearing the Duke of Somerset’s evidence (the Duke both admitting the necessity of these accounts and of placing them under the sole direction of the Accountant General)—that it is quite competent to frame a form of accounts, and that the evil would be remedied under the existing system in six months. I do not believe there is any difficulty in doing it.”

Since then six years had nearly elapsed, and yet they were told that the accounts would be better “next year.” Again, in the same Report, another opinion of Sir James Graham was thus given—

“I am assured by Sir Richard Bromley and Mr. Anderson, who are the highest living authorities, in my humble judgment, with respect to accounts, that there is no difficulty in so forming accounts upon the principle of double entry so that at once, year by year, Parliament may be told what has been spent in the building of any gunboat, in the building of any three-decker, in the making of any dock, or in the repair of any quay. And the account will be imperfect unless every kind of charge which a shipowner would bring to book is carried to account. An account misrepresenting values is infinitely more dangerous than no account at all; an imperfect account, in my humble judgment, is infinitely worse than none.”

And the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) stated before the same Commission in 1861—

“If the accounts were kept so as to show the exact cost of ships a competition in economy would be established between the different yards which would be of great benefit to Her Majesty’s service.”

Now, though he (Mr. Seely) admitted that the accounts had been improved, they were still very imperfect. Before 1865 the gentlemen having the management of the accounts actually omitted to charge in the cost of building ships the very wages of the foremen of the smiths, millwrights, ropemakers, caulkers, sailmakers, riggers, painters, joiners, &c., engaged in building them, as well as rent, taxes, the cost of surveys and valuations, and other items. Thus about £2,000,000 was omitted from account of cost of ships from 1860 to 1863. They even now denied that the pensions to artificers formed part of the cost of ships, when, as everybody knew, the wages paid were lower in consequence of those pensions. It was now admitted in principle that interest should be charged; but what a farce was the manner in which they had carried that out! The sum of £46,398 in 1864-5 for the first time was put down for interest. They admitted that they had upwards of £5,000,000 worth of stores; and was it not a fair estimate to put down £5,000,000 more for buildings, plant, machinery, and works for ships in progress? If so, they had £10,000,000 of money, on which £46,398, or not one-half per cent, was charged as interest for last year. It was the practice of men of business to charge 5 per cent interest on plant and buildings, 5 per cent additional as interest for depreciation of buildings, and 10 per cent for depreciation of machinery. An analogous rule to that was adopted in the case of the Army, so that there was the practice of a Public Department from which the dockyard authorities might take example. He maintained that it was complete nonsense to charge £46,000 as interest upon £10,000,000, as though it covered all the depreciation of plant and buildings. Apart from this, however, they had not yet got what Sir James Graham said they ought to get—namely, the cost of building every ship and gunboat. True, they had got the wages and the materials in each yard; but a large number of incidental expenses were lumped together from all the yards, and then divided pro rata over all the ships built in all the yards. The result was that any particular yard which might be economically managed as to its incidental expenses received no credit for it; whereas a yard which had an extravagant expenditure of that kind, as was the case at Portsmouth, got less than its true share of this branch of cost set down to it. Was that a clear and accurate mode of rendering accounts? The fact was officials disliked these incidental charges. The Duke of Somerset seemed to have a particular objection to them. He would assume that the speech made in another place the other day, and a pamphlet which had been widely circulated on that subject, both proceeded from the same author. Now, at page 57 of that pamphlet it was said—

"The misunderstanding which has already sprung up in the public mind from an erroneous view of these accounts will render it necessary to re-consider the mode in which the expenditure of the dockyards is now brought to account so far as relates to 'incidental expenses.'"

He trusted the House would carefully watch the consequences that might ensue. They might get rid of the system of putting these "incidental expenses" into the account, and not get rid of having to pay for them. They might even have to pay more for them, when they were no longer presented as a separate item. He hoped it would not be thought that he was out of order if he referred to what had been said in "another place" as to the cost of the navy. In his speech the other night, the noble Duke said—

"We also built by contract vessels at an expense of about £7,000,000."

And in the pamphlet, at page 25, this was stated—

"The portion of the £17,000,000 which was actually paid for vessels built by contract, and for the purchase of steam machinery, may at once be struck off from any question of dockyard management. Nearly £7,000,000 was paid for vessels built by contract and for the purchase of steam machinery. . . . Excluding, then, £7,000,000 paid for contract work and purchases from the £17,000,000, there remains £10,000,000 expended in wages and materials."

Now, he (Mr. Seely) wanted to show the House that there was not £7,000,000 paid for vessels built by contract and for steam machinery, and that there was considerably more than £10,000,000 expended in wages and materials, according to the very figures put forward in that pamphlet. The total sum voted in six years for vessels built by contract and for purchasing steam machinery was put down at £7,296,802; but the total sum expended was only £6,255,886; and it was therefore rather incorrect to say it was about £7,000,000. And in the appendix to the pamphlet—a part of it which few people probably would read—there was this statement at page 79:—Labour at home and abroad, £6,971,143; materials used in shipbuilding, about £1,000,000 per annum for six years, or £6,000,000 altogether. These two items made a total of £12,971,143; and there was a difference, therefore, of £2,971,143, as compared with the statement put forth in the body of the pamphlet, that about £10,000,000 were expended for wages and materials. There was another remark calling for notice—to the effect that vast sums were spent for police and schools. The object of the noble writer was to show that the public dockyards were placed at a disadvantage as compared with private yards on account of these two items. If, however, they paid so large a sum to the police for watching their property, what was there in the organization of the public yards which rendered that necessary more than in the case of private yards? With regard to schools, the whole sum paid for them in the seven dockyards at home and the two abroad in six years amounted only to £26,772, or about £2,462 per annum. The object of the noble Duke's observations in another place evidently was to run down private yards and elevate the public yards; and he must confess his great regret that his Grace should have ventured to speak in the terms he had done of an hon. Friend of his and a Member of that House. To say the least, those observations were very ungenerous and in very bad taste. Whatever might have been the misfortunes, or even the faults, of the hon. Member for Bristol (Sir Morton Peto), at any rate he had done that which many Members of that House had not done, and perhaps never would do—he had conferred in his time a great public service on this country. During the Crimean war, when there was almost a deadlock between Balaklava and Sebastopol, who was the man that came forward to relieve our army from that deadlock? It was his hon. Friend, then the Member for Finsbury, who went to the Secretary for War and suggested to him that it would be very possible to lay down a railway; that he would willingly do that free of any profit, and put his whole plant at the service of the Government. That offer was almost immediately accepted, and he need scarcely say what was the result. But that was not all. A question was raised whether his hon. Friend could perform that and still keep his seat, even although he was not going to receive any profit. He resigned his seat for Finsbury; he did so in order to do some good to his country, and although thereby no benefit was to accrue to himself. Therefore, it was exceedingly ungenerous for a person in the position of the noble Duke to speak of him as he had done when his fortunes had become clouded. He (Mr. Seely) would not weary the House by repeating the statements which he had on former occasions made to show that the cost of vessels built in Her Majesty's dockyards was very much larger than that incurred for those constructed by private firms. He had then pointed out that eleven ships had cost £475,825 for repairs, according to the Admiralty given cost, but that if the items omitted which a private firm would add were reckoned, such as wages of foremen, rent, interest, &c., the real cost of the repairs would be about £610,000; whereas eleven similar new vessels could be purchased at the rate of £33 per ton and £55 per horse-power for about £477,000, or these repairs cost more than new vessels by £133,000. He would, in the next place, advert to some remarks which he had made last Session with regard to the cost of repairing certain boats. The right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty had charged him with extreme exaggeration because of those remarks, although he was good enough to acquit him of intentional misrepresentation, and had solemnly told him that a Member of that House ought, before he brought such accusations, to be very careful about his facts. He (Mr. Seely) had stated, amongst other examples then given, that at Portsmouth in 1864-5 one 25 feet cutter had been repaired at a cost of £66, when she could have been bought built new and fitted for about £30; but the right hon. Baronet had charged him with having substituted three for one. He should, however, quote from the Returns which he had moved for in consequence of the First Lord's contradiction of his (Mr. Seely's) statements, which gave the cost and the rate book price of building and repairing the boats in Her Majesty's dockyards for 1864-5, and ask the House whether in the statements which he had made he had or had not been guilty of extreme exaggeration. From the document to which he referred it appeared (Return 505, Boats, p. 32, line 8) that the dockyard given cost of repairing one 25 feet cutter was £50 11s. 7d., and if to that amount were added £21 18s. 5d., which would be about the same percentage for incidental and omitted charges that the last published accounts of the Admiralty showed, was added to the cost of ships, including the boats when the accounts were finally made up at Somerset House—namely, 43½ per cent—the cost of repairing the boat in question would be found to be £72, as against £30, for which sum he maintained she could have been purchased newly built, including the cost of £7 10s. for her fitting, £22 10s. being the price at which the Admiralty purchase 25 feet cutters, and £7 10s. being the dockyard rate book price for fitting a 25 feet cutter, as is stated in Return No. 505, p. 32, line 8. He also stated that eighty-three boats had been repaired at Portsmouth which it would have been better to have burnt; and the Returns to which he referred fully supported that statement, inasmuch as new ones could have been bought for about the same sum. Again, it appeared from those Returns that the repair of sixty-three boats in 1864-5 had cost (Dockyard figures) £2,505 at Portsmouth, which, if the percentage he had before indicated were added to it, would amount to £3,590, whereas they could have been purchased built new for £2,890. He should next trouble the House with a few individual instances copied from the Returns in question. At page 32, line 4, it would be seen that the repairs of a 26 feet cutter at Portsmouth Dockyard cost £56 19s., the real cost, including the items as given in Return 54, page 70, being £81, while she might have been bought built new for £27 6s. Again, a 25 feet cutter was set down as having cost £57, which could be bought built new for £22 10s. A 23 feet cutter, it further appeared, cost £60, which might have been bought built new for £20 14s.; a 30 feet gig £73, which might have been bought built new for £22; a 24 feet gig, £51, which might have been bought built new for £17 12s.; and a 25 feet whaleboat, £53—he included in each case the percentage—which might have been bought for £19 3s. 4d. From page 19 of the Returns it appeared that the cost of fitting four 27 feet whaleboats at Devonport, being all that were fitted, was £38 13s. 7d., while the rate book price of fitting amounted to £26 8s. At Chatham, two 27 feet whaleboats, all that were fitted, cost £41 1s. 3d. to fit, while the rate book price was £13 4s., Chatham's cost of fitting being double that of Devonport. Again, to take a particular example, at Chatham the cost of fitting one 27 feet whaleboat was £20 12s. 3d., as against the rate book price £6 12s.; whilst at Devonport, fitting a 27 feet whaleboat cost only £5 18s. 9d., rate price £6 12s., or Chatham fourfold Devonport. At Devonport, six 24 feet gigs, all that were fitted, cost to fit £34 17s. 8d., the rate book price being £34 4s., showing that the fitting could be done for that money; whilst at Chatham two 24 feet gigs, all that were fitted, cost to fit £30 13s. 5d., rate book price being £11 14s. 8d., or Chatham three or fourfold as much as Devonport. Having said thus much with respect to the boats, he should trouble the House with one or two items from the Accounts for 1863-4. He was obliged to go back to that year, for those for the last were so condensed that he was unable to criticize them. From the Return "Dockyards and Steam Factories No. 379," for 1863-4, under the head of "roperies accounts," he found that the cost at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Devonport was £322,863, while the rate book value and the price charged to the ships for these materials was only £279,825, so that there was an excess of cost over rate of £43,038, and £43,038 too little charged to the ships for these items, if they came into any ships' accounts before 1864-5. Again, he found that at Portsmouth 261½ tons of Riga tarred yarns cost £13,704, while the rate book value, or the price charged to the ship, was £10,532, the excess being £3,172. At Portsmouth, also, it appeared that three Dantzic topsail-yards, 15 inch diameter, cost £434, the rate book price being £150, so that the charge to the ship was £284 too little, and the cost was 190 per cent above rate. Yet at Devonport six Dantzic and red pine yards, 15½ inches, cost only £263, the rate price being £264, or Portsmouth's cost is nearly threefold that of Devonport. As furnishing another instance of mismanagement in our dockyards, he had last year mentioned that our dockyards had been paved with cold-blast pig iron made fifty or 100 years ago, before the hot-blast process was invented, and which iron had, before the introduction of steam vessels, been used in sailing ships as iron ballast; but the Duke of Somerset, speaking on the subject in "another place," was reported to have said that, considering the smallness of the amount involved, a great deal too much had been made of the matter. Now, he had no doubt that he and the noble Duke might differ in their estimate of what was a small or a large amount. The question was a relative one; but whether 35,225 tons of iron ballast, costing and being now worth £184,931, should or should not have been laid down in the dockyards as paving, when the very best granite or other paving could have been bought and laid down for a tenth of the value of the iron, was a matter with respect to which the taxpayer could hardly be assumed to be indifferent. He had also mentioned another point, and that was that since 1842 Messrs. Brown, Lenox and Co. had been paid for anchors something like £170,000 above the average prices at which four first-class firms had offered to make exactly similar anchors, subject to exactly the same tests as those supplied by Brown, Lenox and Co. The accounts had for a series of years been imperfect, and were not perfect yet. Accounts, however, were but a means to an end, and though the work in the dockyards might be very expensive, yet, if we had an efficient fleet, the country would not be inclined to grudge the expenditure. In the Committee of 1861 Admiral Bowles stated, in his evidence on the Syrian question in 1840—

“That the French Admiral, who had an equal force with ourselves, soon found out how weakly our ships were manned, and how badly they manœuvred, and he wrote to his Government . . . for permission to attack the English fleet, saying that he would answer for obtaining a complete victory.”

And Admiral Bowles further said that, according to the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Charles Napier, the fleet sent to the Baltic in 1854 was “the worst fleet ever sent to sea by Great Britain since our naval history commenced;” and Sir John Pakington stated that—

“The French went ahead of us in 1862 in the application of steam power to the larger and heaviest class of ships, and again went considerably ahead of us in the invention and application of armour-covered ships. Of course I may be wrong; but it is my opinion that if you had not had a Board of Admiralty, and had had a Minister with concentrated responsibility, with the feeling that everything done or left undone would be visited upon him, the French would not have gone ahead of us as they did, either with respect to the application of steam to line-of-battle ships or the adoption of the invention of armour-covered ships.”

And he afterwards said he did not blame any particular Minister, but the system; and went on to say—

“That in the late American war in 1814 we kept our frigates at 1,100 or 1,200 tons, until the Americans built ships which we could not cope with.”

And concluded by saying—

“I think it is perfectly fair to attribute these humiliating facts to the inherent weakness in the system of administering the affairs of the navy by a Board.”

Sir John Pakington says the practice was to order three ships of the line a year, but only two had been completed; that in ten years thirty-seven were ordered, but only twenty-five built—there being a deficiency of twelve, or above one per year. The deficiency in frigates also was fourteen. Then, as late as last Session, the right hon. Baronet had stated that our Reserves were very deficient; and he (Mr. Seely) would corroborate that by a single fact which had been communicated to him on the highest authority. He was told that there was not a single vessel which could be sent to the African station when the vessel on that station had remained there longer than she ought to have done. That vessel came home in October, but no vessel could be found to supply her place, and she could not be repaired till the end of January. Now, it should be borne in mind that the rate of mortality on the African stations was very high indeed. In the Mediterranean it was 9·5 per 1,000; on the North American Station 7·9 per 1,000; on the East Coast of America 14·5 per 1,000; and on the West Coast of Africa 23·8 per 1,000. There was one other point which he desired to bring under the notice of the House. In the early part of the year 1863 the then Controller General of the Coastguard saw that in the Estimates of that year 500 additional men had been voted for the Coastguard service. He had not been consulted on the subject, and was not aware that there was any necessity for these men. He accordingly instituted inquiries in his office, but could not find any one who knew anything about the matter. Then he wrote to the Board of Customs, but they also knew nothing about it. He next spoke or wrote to the Accountant General, but the only reply he received was that the Admiralty had given the order for the additional men. In 1862-3 there were 3,850 men voted for the Coastguard; their pay was £172,044; there were 1,150 civilians, with pay amounting to £72,274—the total number of men being 5,000, and the total amount of pay £244,318. In 1863-4 the figures were as follows:—Men, 4,500; pay, £199,047; civilians, 1,000; pay, £62,921; total men, 5,500; total pay, £261,968. The figures in 1864-5 were:—Men, 4,000; pay, £173,739; civilians, 950; pay, £60,044; total men, 4,950; total pay, £233,783. Now, it was evident that this Department did not want the additional 500 men they asked for, because they did not take them on the next year. It was fortunate that, though the House in 1863-4 voted the pay for the additional 500 men, they did not vote the money requisite to find them in lodging and house-rent. When the Controller General pointed out this circumstance the answer he received was that the error could not be rectified till the following year. The only other matter with which he should trouble the House showed the want of any well-defined responsibility in the present system. It was a return of the quantity of steel or chilled iron shot or shell on board Her Majesty's ship Favourite, which sailed last spring to protect British vessels on the North American coast. It would be in the recollection of many hon. Members that it was thought last spring that possibly there might be a difference of opinion between the United States and England respecting the fisheries, and the United States sent an iron-clad fleet to protect their fishing vessels, whereupon the destination of the Favourite, which was under orders to proceed to the Pacific, was changed, and she was directed to go to the North American coast. Well, the Return which he moved for was to the following effect:—

"1. When last sailed from England to North America?—April 24, 1866.

"2. Had she any steel or chilled iron shot or shell on board?—None.

"3. Have any steel or chilled iron shot or shell been since sent to her; and, if so, how many, and when?—None have been sent; but 1,539 chilled shot for 7-inch guns have been issued to Halifax for the land service, and they could on an emergency be made available for the Favourite.

"4. If none have been sent, is it intended to send any, and when?—Steel shot and shell for the Favourite will probably be ready in about the second week in September, and they will then be shipped to Halifax."

Now, this was a very serious thing, for if this vessel had met with an enemy and had not a single steel or chilled iron shot or shell on board she must have been taken. On whomsoever the responsibility might rest, it was clear that somewhere or other there had been a grave dereliction of duty. In conclusion, he thanked the House for the indulgence they had extended to him, and would simply ask them to give effect to the Report of the Royal Commissioners. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the control and management of the Dockyards is inefficient, and that the inefficiency may be attributed to the following causes:—

1st. The constitution of the Board of Admiralty;

2nd. The defective organization of the subordinate departments;

3rd. The want of clear and well-defined responsibility."—(Mr. Seely.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the hon. Member for Lincoln has imposed upon me a somewhat difficult task, but I will endeavour to reply to what has fallen from him as candidly and fairly as I can. Where I think the hon. Gentleman is right I will fairly acknowledge it; but if I express an opinion that he has fallen into error, I feel assured the hon. Gentleman will not think I intend any disrespect towards him. In the first place, I wish for a moment to refer to what has been said with respect to the evidence which I gave before the Committee of 1861 as to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. The hon. Gentleman has made quotations from the evidence showing the opinion I then ventured to express, and I am bound to state that I do not in the least degree recede from any opinion which I then stated. But I ask the House and the hon. Gentleman to consider the circumstances of difficulty, and I may say of responsibility, under which that evidence was given. I was one of the five First Lords of the Admiralty who were examined. The Duke of Somerset was first called. He was followed by Sir James Graham, Sir Francis Baring, and Sir Charles Wood. I was the last of those witnesses called, and, excepting the Duke of Somerset, I was the person who had held that office for the shortest period. All the other Lords had given evidence in favour of the existing constitution of the Board of Admiralty. Placed as I was in the witness-box on that occasion, of course I had only to give frank and truthful answers to the questions to which I was for three days exposed. I could only do that which I did—state the impression made on my mind during my short experience as First Lord of the Admiralty. I have not in the least changed the opinions which I then expressed. I do still think that for the administration of a great Department, a Board is a clumsy machine. I still think that from the constitution of that Board there is an absence of that direct responsibility which ought to exist in a great Department, and I cannot say that I think the constitution and the working of that machine is satisfactory, or well adapted to the discharge of the important and difficult duties which devolve upon the authority which may be intrusted with the administration of the navy. I must remind the House that this was not the first occasion on which I have been led to question the constitution of one of our great Departments. When I had the honour of holding the office of Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, I also filled that of Secretary of State for War. It was a most inconvenient combination, and I stated my conviction, both in public and in private, that if a war should arise and a time of pressure should come it would be impossible to proceed satisfactorily under such an arrangement. That prediction was verified; the Crimean war came, and under the pressure of the war the Government of the day saw the inconvenience and impracticability of that constitution of the War Office, and found it necessary to make a change. I have referred to the fact for this reason, to show the House how difficult it is to effect a change in any one of our great Departments. Although the pressure was so great and the change was necessary, yet from the time of the Crimean war to a year ago, it could hardly be said that the new arrangement of the War Office had been completed. It took many years to effect the change. After the avowal I have made as to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, I am therefore not insensible of the difficulty which would attend an extensive change in that Department. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman may ask—If these are your views why have you not proposed to carry out those views by some practical change? My answer is this:—I have only been in office six months, and during that time I have had before me the question of the dockyards, and the state of the Navy, and my Colleagues have been engaged in considering the great question of the representation of the people. Therefore, I think, I cannot be open to censure if up to this moment I have thought it would be imprudent and unwise to introduce the subject to my Colleagues, and to press it upon their attention. If I continue to hold the office which I now hold, without giving any promise, I may say that so strong is my conviction that the constitution of the Board of Admiralty is not convenient—is not profitable to the public service, that probably I may hereafter consult my Colleagues as to whether some change may not be desirable. The hon. Gentleman has adverted to several subjects which occupied his speech in the House last Session, and which he again touched upon in a speech addressed to his constituents at Lincoln. When he spoke last year, I endeavoured to meet him with perfect fairness. It would have been presumption on my part to offer a detailed answer on all the subjects then brought forward by him. But the undertaking into which I did enter, and which I have endeavoured to redeem, was that I would, during the recess, give my attention to an investigation of the various facts which he had brought forward. Amongst these there was none that startled me more, that startled the public more—none that took me more entirely by surprise, than the statement with regard to the iron ballast in our dockyards, which has since gone by the name of "Seely's pigs." I said I would investigate that statement, and it may be satisfactory to the hon. Member to know that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, there was nothing unfair or untrue in the statements that he made. I really regarded him almost as a visionary when he came to my room at the Admiralty, accompanied by the hon. Members for Oldham and Stockport, and was told by the hon. Member for Oldham that he would repave the dockyards with anything I liked, and give me £100,000 for this ballast. I thought, to use a common phrase, they were chaffing me on the subject, and that they could not be serious. But I believe there was no exaggeration in the matter. On the contrary, I am told that if I had accepted that offer, those who made it would have made an excellent bargain. The course which the Admiralty adopted was this:—We called upon a house of the highest repute in Birmingham to make a selection of these iron pigs and analyse them for the purpose of ascertaining their real merit and market value, and requested them to report thereon. Messrs. Ryland occupied a considerable portion of time in making these experiments, and at length made a report stating that the iron consists of an unusual number of different sorts, I think ten or twelve, that two of these sorts were inferior; but that the remainder were valuable, provided they were sold to the parties whose purposes they would suit. It has been said that the Duke of Somerset spoke of the iron as being of inferior value. I believe the explanation is this:—The Admiralty had from time to time endeavoured to sell this iron, but they could never succeed in obtaining a proper price, and Messrs. Ryland said—

“If you take this iron into the public market, and endeavour to sell it, you would get comparatively nothing for it, because it varies so much in description; it will only fetch its real and proper value when it is sold in a special market, but if carefully selected and sold with judgment and care we believe it will realize a considerable price;”

indeed, a sum not far from that mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. The Board of Admiralty were not satisfied with that one estimate made by Messrs. Ryland, but they applied to a gentleman whose name I have only to mention to show that he is a person of the highest possible authority—I mean Dr. Percy, the head of the mineralogical department of the Museum of Geology, in Jermyn Street. The report of Dr. Percy fully concurs with that of Messrs. Ryland. He expressed a high opinion of its value. The course which the Admiralty propose to pursue is this—to follow the advice of Messrs. Ryland, to select the iron, and then take it into the market, and if they sell it to obtain a fund towards strengthening the power of the British navy. Another point which was brought forward by the hon. Member last Session, and which has been again referred to by him to-night, is as to what he calls the loss of £170,000 by the course the Admiralty pursued in regard to anchors, and I am unable to say that I think the hon. Member entirely right on that point. I believe this is one of those cases in which, I am sure unintentionally, the hon. Gentleman has been led into a very extravagant statement. He told me last year that the Admiralty anchor was almost the worst in existence, and that the result of an inquiry before a Committee was that of eight different descriptions of anchor the Admiralty anchor was found to be the worst except one. The Admiralty anchor to which he then referred was, however, a different one to that now in use, which has been very much altered and very much improved in its construction by the makers, Messrs. Brown and Lenox. The hon. Gentleman arrived at the conclusion that the loss of £170,000 was the result of the difference in the price of the Admiralty anchor when compared with the price of anchors in the open market. But there is no price of anchors in the open market; the price depends on the weight and manner of manufacture. On coming into the office which I now hold, and examining into the state and number of anchors

in our dockyards, I found that the supply of anchors was excessive, and that there was in stock a much larger number of anchors than there was any necessity to maintain, or than was required for the service, and from that time, therefore, we have bought no more. Although the contract with Messrs. Brown and Lenox still exists, I believe it to be in the interests of public business that it should be revised and determined, although I throw no blame whatever on Messrs. Brown and Lenox. The next point to which I desire to refer is one to which the hon. Gentleman referred in his speech at Lincoln, and where, I think, he was in error. The hon. Member alluded to the great extravagance in the Admiralty with regard to the manufacture of lead, and said he was told that they still manufactured sheet lead at a cost of 35s., when they could buy it for 5s., and the hon. Gentleman was met with cries of “shame.” I should be sorry to cry shame against the hon. Gentleman; but if there is any ground for shame at all, I am afraid it must fall upon him, and not upon the Admiralty. I believe that to be a complete delusion on the part of the hon. Gentleman. I have in my hand an official statement from one of the Admiralty officers, showing that the representation of the Admiralty manufacturing lead at 35s. that could be bought for 5s. is completely untrue, and that at the lead mills in the Chatham yard, for instance, sheet lead, calculating the expenditure for labour, costs £19 12s. 6d. per ton, while the present market price in the open market is £20 10s., which is a considerable increase. The same thing occurs in other descriptions of lead, as for instance, in lead piping, which costs at the Chatham yard £21 6s. 2d., against £21 10s., the price in the open market. I believe the hon. Gentleman has been induced—I am sure without intention on his part—to make a complete misrepresentation. I will now refer to a point mentioned by the hon. Gentleman in his speech at Lincoln, and to which he has again referred to-night, and where again I believe he has been led into a very great and extensive error. I refer to the cost of the building of our ships. The hon. Gentleman’s statements to-night were general; but on a former occasion his statements were specific, and last year he particularly called attention to three ships which he had selected—the Frederick William, one of our large line-of-battle ships, the Brisk, and the Cadmus. I shall have to go into some details, for without going into details it would be impossible to vindicate the Admiralty on those points where justice and truth require that they should be vindicated. The hon. Gentleman stated that the Frederick William had cost £281,691, while she might have been built, I presume the hon. Gentleman meant in a private yard, for £134,413. Now, my belief is that it is absolutely impossible for the hon. Gentleman to verify those statements. I know of no process or mode of construing figures by which the hon. Gentleman can prove that that ship cost £281,000. But—and I beg the hon. Gentleman's attention to this view of the matter—I think I have some right to complain of his selecting that ship at all, because she was not a fair specimen of the cost of building an English man-of-war, and for this reason. She was laid down as a sailing ship, and £84,000 was spent to make her a sailing ship, and she was afterwards one of the number selected to be converted into a screw steam man-of-war. An unusually large expense was therefore laid out upon her, and I do not think it fair for the hon. Gentleman to select her, and then, from that selection, to fasten upon the Admiralty a charge of great extravagance. But I have taken pains on this subject, and inquired of those most competent to inform me, and I cannot make out that the Frederick William cost more, including all her fittings, sails, masts, and yards, than £197,000; and I think, under the circumstances, that I have some right to say that the hon. Gentleman has made a great mistake. One of his other cases was that of the Brisk, a smaller ship, which, he said, might have been built for £49,321, but which had cost in repairs £43,498. I believe these figures are all of them entirely erroneous, and I am sure of this fact, that the Brisk, instead of being built for £49,000, really cost, when built, £59,700, while her repairs only cost £38,000. I rely for my figures upon official information, and I think it is to be regretted (assuming that my figures are right, and I cannot imagine that they are wrong) that the hon. Gentleman should make these charges and complaints of extravagance, which excite an outcry from one end of the country to the other, by means of figures which I believe to be entirely erroneous. So with respect to the Cadmus. The hon. Member said that vessel might have been built for £68,000, and that she had cost £65,000 for repairs. Here, again, I am told that the facts are totally different, and that she actually cost £85,000 when built, and her repairs cost only £59,000. Well, that shows that in every one of those cases the hon. Gentleman has been mistaken. I will now turn to another complaint made by the hon. Gentleman on several occasions in this House and elsewhere. In his speech at Lincoln he called attention to the fact that 14s. 2d. was the cost of one article in one of the Government yards, while a similar article cost £1 11s. in another of our yards. This is only one instance out of many in which the hon. Gentleman has complained of the inequalities of cost for similar articles which exist in different yards, and I quite admit that that is a blot in the management of our dockyards. I will not dwell upon that point now, because I will revert to the subject before I sit down; but I may say that I think our dockyards ought to be so conducted that such great discrepancies in price should not occur. I will now refer to what the hon. Gentleman has said both on this and on former occasions with regard to the Admiralty accounts; but I shall not trouble the House at much length on that point, because those accounts now stand in a very different position from that in which they stood when I last had the honour of holding my present office. That improvement in the accounts is due, in my opinion, to the steady, persevering, and consistent efforts of the late Board of Admiralty; and I believe that if there are two Gentlemen to whom more than to others our thanks are due for that improvement, it is to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) and the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). That improvement formed one of the most important portions of the Report of the Royal Commission of 1860, and it is only due to the late Board to say that they lost no time in addressing themselves to the subject. I will not dwell upon the details of the changes that were made in 1860, 1862, and 1864, under the auspices of those who occupied the office of Civil Lord, but it is impossible to deny that great and beneficial changes have been effected. I believe the hon. Member for Lincoln is right in saying that these improvements may yet be carried farther; in fact, I believe they have not been carried to the extent to which my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Childers), who has had so much to do with them, would desire; but the best proof that great improvements have been made is found in the fact that the terms of the hon. Member's (Mr. Seely's) Motion are borrowed word for word from the terms of the Commission of 1860, only omitting that part which referred to the accounts as being no longer applicable. Speaking under correction, for I may be wrong, I think the hon. Gentleman has taken an exaggerated view of the changes that ought to be made in the Admiralty accounts when he urges again to-night, as he has urged continually before, that the accounts and proceedings of our dockyards ought to be assimilated to the proceedings and accounts of private shipbuilding yards. Now, I do not believe that that is a sound or fair view of these transactions. The private shipbuilding yard is conducted for the profit of the owner, but Her Majesty's Dockyards are worked for the defence of the nation, and for the support of our national power. They are altogether on a different footing. The private yard is worked for profit; the public yard is not worked for profit. [Laughter.] I congratulate hon. Gentlemen if they find any comfort in that remark; to me it appears that there is small room for it. They must know the sense in which I said that our public yards were not worked for profit; they are worked for national honour and national defence. They differ most essentially from private yards. In a public yard the public, I admit, have a right to expect that the most rigid economy shall be practised; that the public service shall be carried on at the minimum of possible expense; and that there shall be no waste and no mismanagement. But if you tell me that our dockyards are to be worked upon such a system as that you can take the whole expense of every article in the yard, every store or building, and every inch of ground, and saddle a share of it upon the cost of every ship, you are misleading and deluding the public. The hon. Gentleman referred to a pamphlet which has been recently published, and the authorship of which is attributed to the Duke of Somerset, and he noticed, somewhat in terms of ridicule, the fact that the writer has referred to the presence of police in the dockyards. Now, private yards do not maintain a police force; they do not require a school, a chapel, and a variety of things which our great national establishments are obliged to provide. It is unreasonable, therefore, to saddle the cost of every ship with a share of expenses which are not incurred by private yards. I must therefore say that in that pamphlet, whoever may be the writer, a very reasonable and fair view has been taken of the subject. In my humble opinion that pamphlet is written in terms of great fairness and of great moderation, and I think it is calculated to do much good, and to remove from the public mind much misapprehension. I will read one passage from the pamphlet on this subject. It says—

"The primary object of our dockyard establishments is not to rival private efforts, or to cheapen manufacture, but to secure a large body of skilled workmen, and the machinery necessary for building and repairing our ships of war. If a fleet of iron-clad steamers returned to our ports after an action at sea, and required repair, would the British Government trust to private enterprise? It would be admirable if the enemy would kindly wait while Estimates were asked for and obtained, and the repairs then done; but what opinion would be passed upon a Government who dismantled the dockyards at the demand of manufacturers and economists?"

Whoever may be the writer of that pamphlet I entirely concur in the spirit and scope of that passage. Since I have held my present office I have given directions that the accounts shall be prepared in double column, and that in one column the real bond fide cost of material and labour for building our ships shall be entered, and, in the other, what would be the cost of each ship if all these extra charges were added, and its own proportion placed to the share of each ship. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the subject of boats; but I do think it a great misfortune, greatly to be regretted, that, while engaged in the task, the laudable task he has imposed upon himself, he should have taken so little pains to verify his statements, and have come down to this House, as he did last Session, with a statement which seemed—I really do not know how to express it consistently with due courtesy—but which was, at all events, so erroneous and exaggerated. In the printed papers from which the hon. Gentleman has drawn his information with regard to boats last year, there appeared in one line, "eighty-three boats repaired at a cost of £700;" and in the next line, "284 boats repaired at a cost of £5,600." The hon. Gentleman, however, took the eighty-three from the first line, and the £5,600 from the second, added them together, and made it appear that eighty-three boats were repaired at a cost of £5,600, and that, of course, was a very grave error. Now, he takes a barge for the Royal family and a barge fitted up for an admiral, and, giving the prices, holds them up as specimens of the cost of ordinary boats. This is a matter for great regret, and the only result will be that the public confidence will be shaken in statements made under such circumstances. I pledged myself last year that I would endeavour to ascertain what were the real errors in our dockyard system, and what remedies that system might require. I have endeavoured to redeem that pledge. I have spared no pains in making inquiries, both in the dockyards and elsewhere, and the conclusion which I have arrived at is that in our dockyards the first thing open to complaint is a certain laxity in the manner in which the whole system is carried out. I attribute that laxity mainly to the fact which we cannot disguise—that these are vast establishments carried on for the most part by persons who have no direct pecuniary interest involved. In large national establishments of this description it is of necessity difficult so to shape your system as to carry them on with that vigour, energy, and close attention to expenditure which exists in an establishment where every shilling tells in the pockets of the owner. I am contemplating measures which I hope will check this laxity; but one great evil—one paramount difficulty with which we have to deal, is the want of a better and more effective supervision. That I believe to be the real remedy, and it is to that, above all others, that I have endeavoured to direct my attention. The plan I propose to adopt I will now explain to the House. In 1862 the late Board of Admiralty, under the Duke of Somerset, made some changes in the personnel of the staff belonging to the dockyards, and certain functions of certain officers were changed. The officer who had hitherto been called the Surveyor of the Navy was thenceforth termed the Controller of the Navy. But another and more important change was also made. The management of the finances of the dockyards had previously not been conducted in so satisfactory a manner as was desirable, having been in the hands of the Accountant General, who was overwhelmed with more work than he could well do, with the dockyard accounts in addition to the whole finances of the navy. Under those circumstances, the late Board of Admiralty appointed a gentleman who was well known to that House and the country—namely, Mr. Walker, who had been a member of the staff of the Accountant General. They appointed him to the office of Inspector and Auditor of the Dockyard Accounts. But without intending any censure of the late Board of Admiralty, I must state that in this matter, as it appears to me, they only half did their work. The functions of Mr. Walker were ill-defined; he was called Inspector of Dockyard Accounts, but he had no real authority and no real responsibility, and he was placed in a position from which the public could derive no security that the dockyards would be better managed than they had been before his appointment. That state of things has gone on down to the present moment. When I undertook the investigation of this important subject, the first question that arose in my mind was how we might obtain a better and proper supervision. Upon that point I took counsel with the present Controller of the Navy, Admiral Robinson, a most able and zealous officer; and I received from him much useful information. I asked him whether he was able to manage those vast establishments, the Royal Dockyards, that being theoretically one of the duties attached to the office which he held; and he answered at once that he was not—that he had various other functions to discharge, and that it was impossible he could exercise in that case the necessary supervision. I next asked him whether he would approve of the appointment of a Deputy Controller who should, under his general authority, look after the management of those establishments; and the answer which he gave, after much consideration, was, that instead of creating the office of a Deputy Controller it would, in his opinion, be better to appoint an officer who should do that which cannot be done at present by Mr. Walker—that is to say, who should exercise an effective supervision over the whole of the dockyards. That is the course, too, which the Board of Admiralty now propose to adopt; and we have selected for this purpose Mr. Walker, who is, I believe, the most competent person we could find for the performance of such a duty. We intend to make him, under a new title, Superintendent of Dockyard Accounts; we intend that he shall give his whole time, aided by proper assistants, to the control of the working of these establishments, with the management and superintendence of the great financial expenditure which they involve; and it is to the action of this new officer that I look to put an end to that system of which the hon. Member for Lincoln has justly complained, under which one charge is incurred in one dockyard and another charge in another dockyard, and which is incompatible with perfect efficiency and economy. I am not aware that I need trespass any further on the time of the House. I have endeavoured to redeem the promise which I gave that I would not neglect this great question. I am as anxious as the hon. Gentleman himself can be that this vast Department should be efficiently managed; but I must add that, in my opinion, it is of great national importance that one of these establishments to which we look for carrying on the public service should not be made the object of constant vituperation and attack. Wherever there is room for improvement let us have improvement. But I would entreat the hon. Member for Lincoln to remember that in the management of this business there are engaged gentlemen of as high honour and of as sensitive feelings as himself, and that those gentlemen are depressed, and dispirited, and vexed by these constant assaults. If there are evils in our present system—and I have frankly admitted that there are—let us proceed to their removal, and let us regard that as the great duty we have in this case to perform. I have stated what are the points on which I agreed with the hon. Gentleman, and I have also avowed, although I hope in no hostile or offensive spirit, what are the points on which I think that his allegations are erroneous or exaggerated. Towards the close of his speech he expressed an earnest hope that those who made grave statements would take care to verify them; and I must beg leave to apply that remark to himself. I wish he were a little more careful in all that he says. Whenever he makes what I cannot help regarding as misrepresentations, I shall feel it my duty to endeavour to correct him; but as long as he only seeks to provide a remedy for real evils, no one can be more ready to co-operate with him than I shall be. I have now, in conclusion, only to appeal to the hon. Gentleman not to press his Motion to a division; but if he should persist in submitting it to the House, I shall feel it necessary to move the "Previous Question."

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Sir John Pakington.)

MR. STANSFELD said, that the main allegation of the Resolutions of his hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely)

was that the control and management of the dockyards is inefficient, and the constitution of the Board of Admiralty was merely assigned as one of the chief causes of that inefficiency. The speech of his hon. Friend, however, had been mainly directed to establish the proposition that the Board of Admiralty was inefficient and ought to be abolished. Now, it appeared to him (Mr. Stansfeld) that the constitution of the Board of Admiralty was a wider question than that of the control and management of the dockyards, and it was unreasonable to expect that the House should come to a decision upon the former point when it was merely invited to consider the other and the less important one. His hon. Friend, in framing his Resolution, had adopted the words of the able Report of the Commission of 1860, with the exception of that portion of the Report which related to the dockyard accounts which his hon. Friend admitted were at present of a reliable character—and a more useful Commission, and one composed of more able men, had ever reported upon a public department. But every one who knew anything of the state of the dockyards was aware that great improvements had been effected since the publication of that Report, not only in the mode of keeping the accounts, but in the organization and management of these establishments; and he (Mr. Stansfeld) therefore thought that the adoption of the language of the Commissioners of 1860 would imply too trenchant a condemnation of the system at present in force. The main question, then, was not the constitution of the Board of Admiralty but the efficiency or inefficiency of the management of the dockyards; and he would proceed to state exactly where, how, and how far he agreed, and where, how, and how far he disagreed with the reforming views of his hon. Friend upon that subject. He agreed with his hon. Friend that there was still a want of efficiency in the control and management of the dockyards; and he further agreed with his hon. Friend in assigning that inefficiency to the second and the third causes laid down in the Resolution then before the House. But he did not agree with him in referring it to the fact that a Board was placed at the head of our naval system. He believed that they might obtain from a Board the best possible management of a public department, and he was further of opinion that there were many grave reasons why that House should hesitate before it determined on the abolition of the Board of Admiralty. It was very desirable that they should consider what was the extent of the meaning which the public attached to the charge of "inefficient management" of the dockyards. His hon. Friend had made a very moderate speech that evening, but he had spoken elsewhere, and perfectly conscientiously, no doubt, if not in quite so moderate a tone, upon that matter; and the impression produced upon the public mind by his speeches and the speeches of other gentlemen—or, at all events, the notion floating about among the public—was so much more serious than any one would imagine from the course which the present discussion had taken, that he (Mr. Stansfeld) thought it was worth while to endeavour to gauge and measure, and if possible to remove it. If he were to express fully the opinions which, as far as he could learn, many people entertained upon that subject, he should say that they were ready to believe that the dockyards, if they were not at the present day nests of jobbery were at least scenes of waste, which in its economical effects was almost as serious; that the accounts were intended to mystify rather than to enlighten the public, and that any improvement which had of late been introduced into them had been introduced—and this he had heard stated in the House itself—through the force of external pressure and not through the free action of the Board of Admiralty. The fact was that somehow or other everyone seemed prepared to believe anything that might be said against a Board, while no one seemed prepared to believe anything that might be said in its favour. There was a general predisposition to believe that a Board could not manage public business well. Now, with regard to that matter of dockyard accounts, he believed that it first attracted the attention of his hon. Friend (Mr. Seely) in the course of the winter of the year 1863, and that it was first brought by him under the consideration of the House in the year 1864. In the year 1863-4 he (Mr. Stansfeld) served on the Board of Admiralty, and he had for his successor in office his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). His hon. Friend and himself held themselves responsible for what had been done at that period in the matter of those accounts; and he believed his hon. Friend would be prepared to endorse his statement that the Duke of Somerset and the other members of the Board allowed them to deal freely with that subject, and that for what had been done they were immediately answerable. No doubt they could not hope to manage large public departments so as to be able to compare them favourably with successful private establishments during the period of their not always enduring success, and these, it should be remembered, were the only comparisons ever made in this case. They could not hope to do that unless, in addition to all the departmental energy and supervision which could be brought to bear upon the administration, they were also assisted by the public eye and by the criticism of members of that House who were competent to discuss these matters, and whose criticism was invited by laying the accounts before them. But the hon. Member for Lincoln would not deny that criticism lost half its force and value if it were unjust or even exaggerated, and therefore he felt justified in endeavouring, as far as it was right to do so, to moderate some of the hon. Gentleman's censures. He held in his hand a copy of a speech which his hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln delivered last month to his constituents, and he felt it his duty to qualify some of the criticisms in which his hon. Friend had upon that occasion indulged. His hon. Friend stated that he had found the dockyard accounts exceedingly imperfect, and that no account was given of a sum of £2,000,000 which was expended in building and repairing ships during the four years 1860-3. Now his hon. Friend understood perfectly well the limited meaning which should be attached to those words, but there were many people for whom they would bear a very different and a much larger interpretation. The notion of those persons would be that during those four years a sum of £2,000,000 had been jobbed or at least frittered away and wasted; while his hon. Friend could have merely meant that, although the financial accounts of the navy were, as far as they went, model accounts for any public departments, and gave the House and the country a knowledge of every farthing that had been expended, yet there were not then expense accounts and balance-sheets in the dockyards accounting for the whole of that expenditure, and charging it all against ships and services. So what appeared a momentous revelation amounted merely to this, that previous to 1864 there was no system, or only an imperfect system, of expense accounts in the dockyards. His hon. Friend further said, in the speech which he lately addressed to his constituents, that he had stated that in a document which had been furnished by the Admiralty certain items were omitted, that the truth of that statement had been denied, but that he had proved its correctness to a number of officials at Somerset House, and that the result was that in the last year's accounts from 35 to 40 per cent was set down for incidental expenses, the greater part of which was never charged before. The meaning of that statement was that the improvements in the Admiralty accounts of 1864-5 were not freely and of their own motion, nor even willingly, set on foot by the Board, but adopted only through the pressure which the hon. Member had brought to bear upon the Department by his arguments and speeches. But he (Mr. Stansfeld) should utterly deny the accuracy of any such statement. A short reference to dates would place that matter beyond the possibility of controversy. He joined the Board of Admiralty in the year 1853, and he then spent seven consecutive weeks at Portsmouth for the purpose of examining and revising the system of accounts. At the time he entered the Admiralty there were no exhaustive expense accounts. Sir Richard Bromley, who was a competent accountant and a very able man, would no doubt, if he had had the power, very easily have introduced the system, and was taking steps in that direction. He (Mr. Stansfeld) took no credit for having introduced a system of accurate and exhaustive expense accounts. All the credit he claimed was that, as far as time and opportunity allowed, he had taken pains to carry out the system. Up to the year 1863 there had been only tentative expense accounts. Each ship was debited with the cost of its materials and labour, and with a few other charges, and then, to meet the admitted deficiencies of that system, a certain percentage was charged over and above. When he (Mr. Stansfeld) came to look at the question he arrived at the conclusion that it would be right to do away with this system of dockyard accounts altogether, and to debit to every dockyard every actual fact of expenditure, whether wise or unwise; whether directly incurred in the shape of wages for labour, or in the shape of payment for superintendence and police; and then to place to credit on the other side of the books the whole outcome of the labour. Now all these general items of expenditure to which my hon. Friend referred, and the

35 per cent which was added to the price of labour and material, was abandoned in 1863, and the new system was laid before the Board of Admiralty, approved of by them, and finally laid on the table of this House in the month of March, 1864, while it was since that date that his hon. Friend had addressed himself to this question. He believed, however, he could account for the error into which his hon. Friend had fallen. He had only recently seen the accounts as they were printed for the subsequent years, 1864-5, and he found that the old error had been so far adhered to that an addition of 10 per cent was charged to the items which had already been made exhaustive. He went to Somerset House to inquire into the reason of this unauthorized edition. The reason assigned was not to his mind a good one, but such as it was he gave it to the House. He was told that the rate book was based on these charges, and that the rate book had not been revised since the change in the system of accounts was made. This addition to the cost, he believed, was the explanation not only of this particular error of his hon. Friend, but also of his other charge respecting sheet lead. It appeared from the accounts, said his hon. Friend, that sheet lead, as manufactured at Chatham Dockyard, was charged at £35 per ton, whereas it could be bought at the rate of £5. The inference plainly was that if the Government could not manufacture sheet lead as cheap as private establishments they ought to shut up their rolling mills. But the fact was nothing could be more economically managed than their rolling mills at Chatham; in fact, it was impossible to be more economical, for there was hardly any labour that entered into the charges, and nearly the whole charge consisted in the cost of raw material. But his hon. Friend, looking at these accounts of 1864-5, found there this charge of 10 per cent; he added it to the real charge, and then naturally cried out against the extravagance. This was an illustration of the soundness of the principle he had laid down, to admit nothing into the accounts but the items of actual expenditure. He might add that in 1863-4 there were no exhaustive expense accounts, because there was no valuation of stock and no continuous valuation. Any man of business would see it would be impossible to make accurate expense accounts until these two processes were gone through. His first object, therefore, was to take an account of the stock in hand, and a continuous record of the stock received into the dockyard and taken out would be found in the accounts of 1864-5. He also concurred with his hon. Friend in thinking that, instead of distributing the entire establishment charges over the whole of the ships in the service, it would be better so to arrange them that it might at once be seen in what dockyards the established charges were too heavy in proportion to the labour and material expended. Then his hon. Friend said that these accounts did not include pensions. He agreed with his hon. Friend that they ought to include pensions; for pensions entered into the expense as being really a part of the wages of labour. He came then to the interest that was charged upon the plant. Here he must draw a distinction; whether that interest was to be set down at £46,000, as had been done apparently on good grounds by his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), or whether it should be £500,000, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Seely) was disposed to estimate it, the House must remember that it was altogether fictitious. It was something of an adventitious nature super-imposed upon the accounts; but it formed no part of those accounts for which the Admiralty were responsible. Then came the question of the rate book. His hon. Friend expressed an opinion that the rate book was a thing they would be much better without. He (Mr. Stansfeld), on the other hand, was of opinion that the rate book was absolutely necessary, and he would show the House why. They made, for instance, yearly purchases of hemp from various quarters and at prices varying greatly from one year to another. They had in store in the dockyard cables made from that hemp, which were supplied to the ships as they were equipped for sea. Now, would it be fair to charge to one ship the full price of cables made from hemp when the material was high, while they charged to another ship a less sum for cables exactly of the same material but bought at a lower price? That would be clearly indefensible. The rate book enabled you to compare the cost of production in one yard with the cost of production in another, so that by means of it a large establishment could be economically conducted. In one column of the account was the actual cost of each conversion of manufactured articles, and in another the rate book price was charged. Therefore, having the figures side by side, it was easy to compare the price of every

manufacturing operation with the average cost of that operation throughout the different yards. If you added up the total of the cost and compared it with the total of the rate book column you would get at the difference which in the accounts of 1864-5 was brought into the balance-sheet, and brought, therefore, accurately to account. He hoped that he had now shown that the accounts, as modified when he was in office, were based upon correct principles, and that the improvements which were still necessary were those which had reference, not to the books of accounts themselves, but to the ultimate balance-sheets and abstracts to be laid before that House. He hoped he had also shown that the Board of Admiralty had not adopted these improvements from pressure, but that they had freely been confided to him by the Board to carry out before his hon. Friend began to call attention to these matters. But, to use the happy phrase of the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty, accounts existed only that they might be utilized. Well, he hoped they had been utilized—among other ways, by public criticism. He thought he had the honour of being the first to welcome the criticism of his hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln, and he should feel extreme regret if anything should induce the hon. Member to desist from the course of criticism which he had adopted. But the accounts existed for another purpose, prior both in time and importance to that—namely, in order that they might be utilized in the Controller's Department. In fact, they were so utilized, and he had been given to understand that the accounts of expenditure on wages and materials against ships and services were forwarded weekly to the Controller, and they were available for the superintendents of the dockyards. What they wanted was such an organization as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) referred to in his proposed modification of the Controller's Department. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) informed the House that he had appointed to this new office Mr. Walker, the able head of the Dockyard Accounts, but he did not explain his position, except that he would be placed in closer relation with the Controller.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: He would co-operate with the Controller and be independent of him.

MR. STANSFELD was sure that this arrangement of the right hon. Gentleman would be of great assistance and benefit to the Controller. He was not sure, however, whether the right hon. Gentleman might not have got what he wanted in the Accountant's Department, and he did not know if the right hon. Gentleman's attention had been directed to another department in that office for which he (Mr. Stansfeld) was responsible. He introduced there a new officer as Valuer and Inspector of Dockyard Works, whose special duty was to check all estimates of works, to watch over the quantities required for each undertaking, and to test the quality of the work when completed. His business was to see that the work was done economically, or to know the reason why. He believed that by a combination of these departments—the Accountant General and the Valuer and Inspector of Works being placed, as he hoped they would be, under the same roof—the views of the right hon. Gentleman would be effectually carried out. Let him now refer to the views of his hon. Friend (Mr. Seely) with regard to the construction of the Board. His hon. Friend objected to a Board altogether. But he (Mr. Stansfeld) would remind the House that in all the great business operations of this country, which were carried out on a scale approaching to that of the dockyards, there was either a Board or a very extended partnership. The great thing was for the Board to know how to confer power and discretion upon their subordinates, and to impose on them responsibility. The hon. Member for Lincoln talked of the appointment of such men only as knew their business. On that head he would appeal to the experience of his hon. Friend himself. He had been at the head of a very large manufacturing establishment, and he would ask him whether he ever felt that he was competent to enter into every minute detail in that manufactory of his own personal knowledge? Did he ever feel it necessary that he should have that personal and intimate knowledge of details which he thought ought to be possessed by a Member of the Board of Admiralty, or by a Controller or Superintendent? What they wanted at the head of these large establishments was not simply practical men, but men capable of taking large views. He could not consent to the Resolution if it meant the abolition of the Board of Admiralty, because the Board existed for other purposes besides the management of the dockyards. That was a wide and grave question for the House to consider whether they would interfere with the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty. The tenor of the evidence given in 1860, and the views of those who were called before the Committee, and particularly the opinion of the late Sir James Graham, was very strong against the abolition of the Board. The professional view of the question had been put forward in a readable, and no doubt clever and sound article in the Fortnightly Review by Captain Sherard Osborn; but he thought that House would never adopt it—namely, to have in the Navy a double Department, similar to that which at present existed in the Army, with which he (Mr. Stansfeld) believed no officer in the Army was in love; and, further, not being content with an Admiral Commanding-in-Chief, the First Lord should not have a seat in that House, but be a Member of the other House; because they should withdraw the management and policy of the navy from the control and interference of the House of Commons. With regard to the dockyards themselves, he was of opinion that it was advisable to reduce their number. Deptford Dockyard, he thought, might be satisfactorily abolished, because when they compared the expenses with the result they found it did not pay, and the work done at Deptford could be done at either of the other dockyards without any appreciable increase in the establishment charges. Woolwich might also be abolished when a favourable opportunity offered. He was one of those who thought it was unnecessary to have a Royal Dockyard on the Thames. The House must not forget that they were largely increasing the dimensions of our dockyards at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Devonport, and when we had completed the scheme of construction at Chatham, he thought Sheerness would become useless. He concurred with the hon. Member for Lincoln that the expenditure of the establishments should be kept down, and the number of men entitled to pensions reduced to an understood minimum, and the least possible number of ordinary labourers. He also agreed with his hon. Friend that no rule ought to be laid down to the effect that the Superintendent of our dockyards should be a naval man, or that his term of office should not extend beyond three or five years. A man should not be appointed for life, because he might get too old for his work, but he would appoint him for five years, renewable at the end of that time if he was found to be a fit man and capable of discharging his duties. His belief, however, was that, all things considered, the navy would furnish them with the best men to fill those offices. With reference to the Controller's Department, we had a Storekeeper now upon an equal footing with the Controller. That arrangement dated from Sir James Graham's time. At that time the Controller of the Navy had under him the Surveyor on one side and the Storekeeper on the other. The Controllership was abolished, and many years after he was called the Surveyor; but recently he had been again called the Controller, with more authority than the Controller of old possessed, and the Storekeeper should be simply a buyer as subordinate to the Department. He was glad to find that the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) was about to place the Superintendent of Accounts and the Valuer and Inspector of Dockyards in closer communication with the Controller. The man upon whom ought to rest the main responsibility under the Controller, for the correct and economical business management of the dockyards, was the Inspector and Valuer, who had been appointed in the hope that he would properly discharge those duties; and if he were the Controller he should expect the Inspector and Valuer satisfactorily to fulfil those functions, with reference to the criticisms of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lincoln, and either be able to forestall them or refute them when made, or if not, to exercise the greatest economy. They had heard and read a great deal about dockyard extravagance, and the notion had been suggested from time to time of the possibility of re-constructing our fleet, and of the saving that might be effected. Now that was a misapprehension and a delusion. The total annual expenditure in our dockyards was always less than £3,000,000, and every business man very well knew that a saving of 10 per cent was a successful economical operation, and that on £3,000,000 would be £300,000. In considering the economical management of our dockyards they should consider what he called the policy of our naval administration—that policy which affected the number of officers and men, and the scheme of their pay and of their pensions—the construction and re-construction of our fleets, and the disposition and employment of those cruising squadrons which at the present time seemed to swarm on every coast. Those were the important subjects which it would be necessary for them to discuss on a fitting opportunity. They were much too wide to be discussed on the Resolutions which had been submitted to the House, but when the proper time arrived for discussing them he should be happy to take his humble share in it.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that however ready the House might be to acknowledge the great services rendered to the country by the improved system of accounts which had been instituted by the hon. Member for Halifax, yet the Motion before the House must be borne in mind. The question was whether the dockyard system was or was not efficient; and if inefficient, from what causes the inefficiency proceeded. Two courses were open to the hon. Member for Lincoln: he might have attempted to prove the conclusions of the Commissioners, as to the dockyard inefficiency, from the facts revealed in their Report, and from other facts which had come under his notice. This was the course he took. The inefficiency of the system seemed generally admitted; but yet the hon. Member endeavoured to prove it from various positions; he said that the superintendents should not be naval officers, and that they should hold the office of superintendent for more than seven years; he also went into the details of public expenditure, and the private circumstances of the hon. Member for Bristol. The fault of this course was that the evils were not traced to their sources; the hon. Member had not gone to the root of the matter. Assume it to be all true which he had asserted, yet he had not shown the causes, and therefore could suggest no remedies. The other course which was open to him was to assume the correctness of the conclusions to which the Commissioners had arrived after their very laborious and detailed examination of the matter, and then to turn round on the Minister and say:—The inefficiency of the dockyard system was clearly established in 1861, and the causes of that inefficiency have been proved; what has since been done to remove those causes? Remedies were then suggested; which of those remedies have you adopted? The hon. Member for Lincoln had taken the words of his Motion from the Report of the Commissioners of 1861, with one remarkable omission. The first cause to which they assigned the proved inefficiency was "the constitution of the Board of Admiralty;" this debate had left the truth of that conclusion, in regard to the present time, still in doubt; because the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) surrendered what the hon. Member for Halifax defended. It was therefore open to outsiders to doubt whether the constitution of the Board was not still one of the causes of non-efficiency. The second cause ascribed by the Commissioners was "the defective organization of subordinate departments." That point he would leave for the present, as he would afterwards enlarge upon it. The third cause ascribed was "the want of clear and well-defined responsibility;" and here the right hon. Baronet yielded the position to the hon. Member for Lincoln, because he admitted that there was a want of such responsibility. The hon. Member for Halifax had virtually done the same, when he advocated the creation of one undivided responsibility for the whole. The fourth cause assigned by the Commissioners was not noticed by the hon. Member for Lincoln. It was "the absence of any means of effectually checking the expenditure and the want of accurate accounts." In this sentence two causes of inefficiency were ascribed. The latter had been very much removed by the exertions of the hon. Member for Halifax. More was about to be done in the same direction by the First Lord of the Admiralty. He was going to appoint a "Superintendent of Accounts," to remove the anomaly of "one price being charged in one yard, and another in another yard." It was evident, therefore, that this new office was to be merely a check after expenditure. But the Commissioners had also adverted to "the absence of any means of checking the expenditure," and by that expression the Commissioners meant, as he conceived, some means of checking the expenditure before it took place. On this point nothing had been done. He would presently show what the Commissioners possibly contemplated. The Commissioners proposed seven or eight remedies for the evils which they mentioned. These might be reduced to two heads. They recommended that all the subordinate departments should be entirely independent of each other, but that all should be placed under the Controller General of the Navy, to whom alone the Minister should look for the efficiency and economy of the dockyards. The Storekeeper General is especially mentioned; they recommended that he should be placed entirely under the Controller. This, they said, would obviate the frequent complaints that the description of timber (for example) which is sent is not according to the requisition, or that it is "not of the contract dimensions," or that it is "in excess of the quantity required." For it appeared that a loss of as much as £100,000 was sometimes occasioned when contractors sent in timber in too great a quantity, or not of the proper scantling; which the storekeeper at the dockyard was always very apt to receive. They also recommended that the head of each department should have the appointment of the officers in his department; that those appointments should be taken out of the hands of the First Lord of the Admiralty; as that functionary was liable to be influenced by political objects, and election jobbery was likely to take place in the dockyards. Very little, he believed, had been done to carry out those recommendations of the Commissioners. At the end of the Report of the Commission of 1861 there was to be found a detailed memorandum of the Controller of the Navy, Admiral Robinson, in which that gallant officer complained that the Controller of the Navy had "no authority in the dockyards, and therefore no direct responsibility." He also especially mentioned the Storekeeper General, and complained that he "is entirely independent of the Controller." Admiral Robinson therefore recommended, as the remedy, that the Storekeeper's Department should be consolidated with the Controller's Department. The Controller's Department would then have four distinct branches. 1, the Ship Building Branch; 2, the Engineers' Branch. These there were already. 3, the Account Branch; the business of which would be to estimate the money value of the stores, and keep an account both of those which came in and those which went out. This would be the substitute for the Storekeeper General's Department. He understood the hon. Member for Halifax to say that this part of the recommendation had also been carried out, and that this branch was called "the Stock Account Branch." 4, the fourth branch of the Controller's Department, according to Admiral Robinson's recommendation, was the Store Supply Branch. Thus only, said Admiral Robinson, can "the Controller be directly responsible for all the control and management and expenditure of the dockyards." The hon. Member for Halifax said that "the Storekeeper, who was the buyer for the Controller, ought to be put under the Controller's orders." Thus he also seemed to recommend the creation of a Store Supply Branch. How were the different stores purchased? They were bought sometimes by public advertisement for tenders, and sometimes by private tender. Occasionally, the purchase by private tender was proper, as particular firms might make certain articles of machinery or patent anchors better than other firms; but he was afraid that in many other cases, where the stores should be bought by public tender, they were kept in a few hands, by means of limited or private tenders. He thought that the purchasing was the point where a check on expenditure was required. This he conceived was the meaning of the fourth cause of inefficiency and extravagance ascribed by the Commissioners. In the Contractor's Department an officer, called the Registrar of Contracts, was appointed a few years ago by the Duke of Somerset; and the reason assigned for the appointment was, that there ought to be some check on the expenditure before the expenditure had taken place. That is to say, as this House was the check on the National Expenditure before it had taken place, and the Audit Board was the check afterwards, so in the Departmental Expenditure the Contract Department should be the check before, and the Departmental Audit afterwards. But, in practice, the Registrar of Contracts only registered the acts of others, endorsing transactions which had already taken place without his sanction, and giving legal effect to agreements which had been made without his cognizance. There was, therefore, no check on extravagance of expenditure here. When the head of a department was already overburdened with work and confused by multiplicity of details, it was not to be expected that in making purchases he would trouble himself by haggling for the reduction of a farthing in the cost of this or that article; though where large quantities were bought, as in the case of timber, the difference of a farthing in the price might save thousands of pounds to the country. Therefore, there ought to be some person appointed, whose sole business should be to make these purchases, and to reduce the price before purchase as much as possible. There should be a check on the expenditure before it was made. That check can be obtained only by providing as far as possible a single and undivided responsibility. This was the true principle of checks, whether in national or departmental administrations or expenditure. Each department should alone be responsible for its own service, and for that service only. Now, however, the sub-departments in the navy not only administered their services, but also made purchases; they purchased what they liked, when they liked (that is, whatever the state of the market might be), in whatever manner they liked, where they liked, and on whatever terms they liked. It was always pleasant to a department as well as to an individual to spend money, and especially the money of others. Still more likely was a department to be careless in spending money, for that money belonged not to an individual, but to many; and the head of the department was too busy with details to be strict in purchasing. The latter power—the purchasing power—he would take away from them and transfer to the Contractor's Department. The Contract Department could then be made responsible for the expenditure, and the departments for the efficiency of their several services. The latter would make requisitions for what they wanted; and the Contract Department would buy for them. They would watch with jealousy the expending of their votes by another department, and would soon make it known if there were any careless expenditure, or if they were furnished with a bad article. The love of spending must be checked by another mental tendency. You must call in departmental jealousy to meet the departmental love of extravagance. This was the principle which the House affirmed last year in the Audit Bill; and it was the only true principle in every case. A check on the expenditure would then be introduced, when the administering departments jealously watched the department which spent the money.

Mr. CANDLISH said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) was entitled to the thanks of the House for the important services which he had rendered in calling attention to this subject. The allegations of insufficiency made by the hon. Member for Lincoln, although not in the precise direction, had been confirmed by the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty. No one impugned the grounds of the proposition of the hon. Member—namely, first that those who governed should understand the matters upon which they governed; and it was notorious, as a matter of fact, that not a few of those appointed to govern our naval affairs were unacquainted with the matters over which they presided; another ground was that having a good servant, it was the duty of the Department to retain his services; but the present system superseded those services at the end of three or five years—a blot on our system, admitted by the hon. Member for Halifax and by the First Lord opposite (Sir John Pakington.) Although the Board of Admiralty had been administered by some of our ablest men for years past, yet they did not hesitate to admit that many grounds of complaint still remained, and ought to be removed.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE claimed the indulgence of the House in addressing it on the Motion of the hon. Member for Lincoln. He had been for a few weeks only a Member of the late Board, and most of the matters which had been referred to in the debate had occurred two or three years ago, consequently he feared he should scarcely do justice to his late colleagues. He should not, indeed, have ventured to speak on the present occasion if it had not been that during the autumn he had had an opportunity of visiting the only two countries with the navies of which we need concern ourselves—the United States and France, and acquainting himself with the organization of their dockyards. Many hon. Members would recollect that an hon. Baronet (Sir Morton Peto) had last Session told the House that having recently visited the dockyards of America, he had come away with feelings of humiliation for his country. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) felt bound to say, however, that to his mind there was no comparison between our dockyards and those of the United States. The American establishments were under the superintendence of naval men, and the minor officials were precisely of the same character as they were in this country; but politics were allowed greatly to interfere. It was the usual course in America that the minor officials of dockyards, but not the superintendents, should be changed with the change of Government. While he was in the United States President Johnson made a great many changes, and amongst them were a large number of dockyard officials. Such a practice he should think must greatly interfere with the efficiency of the system, but it probably did less harm than would be the case in this country; for Americans seemed to be more ready than Englishmen to turn from one profession to another. Comparing what he had seen at Portsmouth and Plymouth with what he had seen at Philadelphia and Brooklyn, he could not for one moment doubt that our yards were infinitely superior. The supervision of labour was better, the work was better done, and the diaries of labour and the accounts generally were more perfect in our yards than in the American. The Americans manufactured a great deal more than we did, especially in the matter of

anchors, cables, and machinery. He was told that they had found it necessary to do so because they could not get work of such excellent quality from private firms; and the experience which they had had in the blockade of Charleston and Wilmington had shown them the supreme importance of having good anchors and cables. This circumstance might be quoted in explanation of the conduct of the Admiralty in purchasing their anchors from Messrs. Brown and Lenox, who for a long series of years had continued to supply the very best anchors. With respect to the central Administration at Washington, it was more simple and complete than our own; it was a Government of civilians, and it was divided into nine Departments; but it differed from ours in having no responsibility to Congress, for the Secretary of the Admiralty had no seat in Congress as our First Lord had in Parliament. It must be recollected also that in America the military professions were much more under control of the civil than was the case, or could be under present circumstances, with us. If, like the hon. Member for Bristol, he felt any humiliation while in America, it was with regard to the manner in which the navy of this country had been discredited by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the close of last Session on the state in which our navy was left by the late Board. He believed that that statement was unfounded; but it should be recollected that the remarks made in that House went to other countries, and formed public opinion there. That was the case in America and France, in both of which countries he had found an universal belief among civilians that our navy was no longer to be feared. When he asked for the grounds of such a belief he was almost always referred to the speeches of the First Lord of the Admiralty, the statements in which, he was bound to say, had been greatly exaggerated by the press. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Hear, hear!] And here he was requested by Sir Frederick Grey, one of the members of the late Board, to explain that the memorandum which he had left on the state of the reserves of the navy, and which had been produced by the present Government, had been completely misunderstood. Sir Frederick begged him to state that he was not referring to the state of the navy generally, but to a certain small class of vessels—namely, paddle-wheel steamers—a matter of very minor importance—and that he was making no reference whatever to iron-clad vessels, corvettes and frigates. It would be gratifying to the hon. Member for Lincoln to know that there was a very simple explanation of his complaint respecting the Favourite. When that vessel was sent out Palliser's chilled shot had not been adopted, but she had steel shot on board and the ordinary cast-iron balls; nor had the American squadron any better armament. There was one point on which he agreed with the hon. Member for Lincoln—namely, as to the post of the Controller of the Navy. If a civilian could be found fit for the post, he ought to be placed there, but he did not believe that a person better qualified for the office than Admiral Robinson could be discovered. If competent civilians could be found for the offices of Superintendents of Dockyards, by all means let them be appointed, but he apprehended that it would not be easy to find suitable men. In both France and the United States the superintendents of dockyards were naval men—the reason given in both cases being that naval men were on the whole found most competent to deal with the various matters which came before them, and which included many things besides the building of ships. As to our dockyard accounts he could only say that they had been very greatly improved by the late Board, but they were yet capable of some improvement. They wanted another chapter showing the correlation between the sums voted in the Budget and the expense accounts of the same year, and when that was supplied they would be in some respects better than those of the French navy. He might observe that the valuation of our neighbours' fleet was set down at £18,000,000; that of their docks, including the breakwater at Cherbourg, £15,000,000; and that of their stores, £10,000,000. He did not find that in the value of their ships they included interest on the value of their stores and buildings. He could see why we should do so. We had large stores not for the purpose of immediate manufacture but as a reserve in the case of war so as to be prepared for emergencies. The hon. Member for Lincoln, however, was quite able, for purpose of comparison with expense of building in private yards, to add a pro rata charge for stores and plant to the cost of every vessel, if he could persuade anybody that that was a fair course to take. The same remark applied to the police and some others of the incidental expenses. The hon. Gentleman found fault with the Duke of Somerset's calculation of the amount spent on the dockyards during the last six years; but he thought that the noble Duke's calculation (£12,000,000) was perfectly accurate. For that sum 109 vessels had been built, while the average number of ships in commission that had been repaired was 210, and the average number of ships in reserve which had been repaired and refitted was 350. It was quite clear, then, that the operations of our dockyards were enormous, and though he did not deny that there was a margin within which economy might be possible, he did not think that much could be done in that way so long as our policy required us to keep up squadrons in China, in the Pacific, at the West Indies, and in almost every other part of the world. With respect to the late Board of Admiralty, it was true that the office of Civil Lord, which he held for a short period last year, witnessed numerous changes during the preceding six years; but the Duke of Somerset, Lord Clarence Paget, and Sir Frederick Grey were members of the Board during the greater part of that term, and there had been a continuous system of management, which had, he believed, rendered greater service to the public than had been of late represented. He might add that its policy had been equally uniform; and he trusted that if the present Board lasted as long, it would be able, when it left office, to give as good an account of its doings, and receive more credit from the public than their predecessors.

Mr. SCOURFIELD, having lived for a number of years in the neighbourhood of a dockyard, knew a good deal of what was going on in the naval establishments, and he could not concur in the general censure pronounced by many hon. Members on the administration in our dockyards. It was he thought unfair to compare the management of the dockyards which should be carried on on the principles approved of by the House, with that of private dockyards, as to which no such restrictions existed. The creative and the critical faculties could scarcely be exercised together. He considered it a salutary thing that the Board of Admiralty was responsible to Parliament, as he believed that evil could not long exist from the fear of exposure in that House. The discussions which took place in Parliament were a sufficient guarantee that whatever might be wrong would not be long allowed to remain unremedied. He had sat on Committees in which the questions under discussion had been considered, and the opinion expressed by the majority of the witnesses examined was to the effect that it would not be desirable to separate the action of the Board of Admiralty from the control of the House of Commons. With reference to the comparisons instituted between the public and private dockyards, he might mention that he had some disagreeable experience of the management of private concerns as an original shareholder in the Great Eastern concern, not, however, to an extent to call for any large amount of sympathy, but sufficiently to show him how such matters were conducted. If what happened in that instance had happened in respect of any of our public dockyards they never would have heard the end of it. The Great Eastern was, no doubt, a very useful vessel, but she was a splendid monument of the fact that all the great movements of the country depended upon the supply of that very valuable class—the dupes. With regard to the keeping of the dockyard accounts, he remembered one of the superintendents saying to him, some years ago, that when a ship was built more economically in his yard than she would have been in one of the others, he got no credit for the economy, owing to the accounts being mixed up. Now, he thought a separation of the accounts would be useful. He believed that naval officers made the most efficient superintendents of the yards, among other reasons, because there was a general confidence felt by the workpeople in their perfect impartiality. He did not lay much stress upon the familiarity possessed by a superintendent with some one kind of work, believing that where operations of the most diverse kinds were necessarily conducted in one and the same yard a general power of governing well was better than mere detailed acquaintance with some special branch. The rule under which superintendents were compelled to leave the yards on hoisting their flag as admirals had the effect he thought of shortening their term of office injudiciously. In the yard with which he was best acquainted, owing to this rule only two superintendents had served out their full period of five years. It would, he thought, tend to better management if the period of holding the office of superintendent were extended.

Mr. Scourfield

MR. SAMUDA only ventured to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments upon one portion of the statement of the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Scely) which took a wide and extensive range. The subject to which he alluded was that which had reference to the Storekeeper's accounts of the navy, and to the Controller's Department. It had been generally admitted that considerable improvement was effected during the last year in the accounts of the navy. He had no doubt that was so; but on looking over those accounts he could not help feeling that, whatever amount of knowledge was possessed on the part of the Controller, who was supposed to understand all those accounts, it would be quite impossible for any one to arrive at a sufficiently clear and satisfactory knowledge of the cost of each department to enable him to form a judgment as to whether the cost of the work done was reasonable, or the object of it a proper one. It seemed to him that there should be no great difficulty in assimilating the manner of compiling the accounts in the dockyards to that in private yards. The whole object of an account was to place clearly and accurately before a person the amount that had been spent, and the manner in which the different items comprising the whole had been apportioned; and there ought to be little difficulty in accomplishing this, whether in a Government establishment or in a private one. The accounts in their present form did not enable hon. Gentlemen to ascertain what had been spent on each vessel, which was a piece of information that was of the first importance. He also considered that it would be impossible to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement unless the whole of the accounts connected with the constructive department were removed from the Storekeeper's department and put under the control of the Controller, for divided responsibility must always be a source of confusion and mischief. The hon. Gentleman proceeded to explain that one cause of difficulty was that the materials used in shipbuilding yards came into the dockyards in one form, and left the yards in a very different form and with a very different value, and unless this was kept in sight, and a simple plan adopted of estimating the difference and of correcting any excess or deficiency in it, errors must inevitably ensue. He did not, however, consider that it was necessary, except for the purpose of instituting a comparison between the expenditure in public and private yards, that interest should be charged in the accounts upon the plant in the dockyards, because the case was not the same as in the private yards. The expenditure was voted every year without, of course, any expectation that any interest upon the plant in the dockyards would be obtained.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the principles which were now generally admitted to be the only sound basis for dockyard accounts were explained in a memorandum which he laid upon the table in the latter part of 1865. He was glad to see that this paper had received the general approval of the House. He considered that the hon. Member who had just spoken had rightly laid down the state of the case with respect to two points in the accounts which had been questioned by the Member for Lincoln. He had correctly explained the principle on which the rate book prices should be adjusted from time to time, and also that the difference between the rate book value and the actual cost of articles shown in the manufacturing accounts should go either in the reduction or in the increase of the incidental expenses spread over the ships of the year, before the balance was struck. He had also rightly argued that the sum taken in the shape of interest on the plant ought not to be classed with the actual expenditure, but should only be estimated for the purposes of comparison with private yards. He (Mr. Childers) did not pretend to assert that the accounts, as they were now laid before Parliament, could be said to be perfect. It was no light task, he could assure them, to effect a revolution in accounts amounting to millions, referring to seven different establishments, containing a vast number of different shops and factories, which had for a long space of time been compiled by the officers in a particular manner. He considered that it was much better to work the necessary change gradually, and in a tentative way, by the substitution, as far as possible, of sound for unsound principles, rather than attempt to revolutionise the whole method at a stroke, which could only have ended in failure or in delay in the presentation of the accounts. There were three elements of a general balance-sheet in accounts of this nature. The first was the cash account, and it was necessary that the account of the expenditure of each year should be so stated that it might clearly be seen how much had been applied to the dockyards, exclusive of all other services. The next was the store and manufacturing account, showing the amount of stores in stock at the commencement and end of the year, those received and issued, and the result of the processes of conversion and manufacture. The third was the capital account, which ought to show the value of the plant and public property in the dockyards, and the depreciation and cost of maintenance during the year. These three accounts should be brought together in a general balance-sheet. If his hon. Friend who had criticized the accounts of the dockyards would refer to this paper and the forms attached to it, he would see that when carried out they would complete the accounts of the dockyard. He was not blaming the present Board of Admiralty for any imperfection in these accounts up to the present time, but pointing out the further steps which should be taken to carry out to the full the object of his paper. He fully agreed in the suggestion that the general charges should be distributed over each dockyard, instead of being stated in lump, and he hoped that this would be shortly carried out. The Member for Lincoln contended that the amount put down as interest on capital was insufficient, and that it ought to be £500,000 instead of £46,000. But this idea was, in his opinion, founded on an entirely erroneous view of what the dockyards really were. The object of the Royal Dockyards was not merely to build ships in time of peace. If we were never to contemplate a great foreign war, and only had to keep the police of certain seas, and to move about troops and distinguished persons, we should condemn the dockyards as a nuisance, and contract for our ships with private firms. The House would not tolerate dockyards on such a theory, and would not expend £5,000,000 or £10,000,000 in their construction, or keep £5,000,000 worth of stock in them for any such purpose. The dockyards were maintained in order that we might be prepared for any sudden outbreak of war, and were thus one of the best guarantees for peace; and it was therefore absurd to charge as a matter of business, and for comparison with private trade, the interest on the stock, plant, and value of dockyards maintained for purposes of war. But we had sought for a sound principle, and it was thought fair to charge 3 per cent on what was called the "out-turn" of the year, and for this reason, that on the average of years it was found that in the private trade the outturn was about equal to the value of the plant and stock in hand. That principle was arrived at after due inquiry among private firms. Having stated these few points in connection with the Admiralty accounts, he hoped that he might be permitted to say a few words upon the general merits of the question. The management and control of the dockyards had been condemned as inefficient; and the question had also been raised whether the department should be administered by means of a Board or by means of a Secretary of State. Without entering into this last question to any great extent, he would say that the management of great manufacturing establishments was not the only duty of the Board of Admiralty. Whether this was better intrusted to a Board or a Secretary of State was a fair matter for discussion; but before abolishing the Board it would be necessary to consider its action in other and far more important matters, and also the machinery to be substituted for it. If, for instance, the navy was proposed to be administered as the army is, by a Secretary of State in Pall Mall and a Commander-in-Chief in Whitehall, he would infinitely prefer the present state of things. But as to the dockyards, he was ready to admit that a Board was a bad administrative machine. The House looked very little at the patronage of the navy or to the movement of the fleet, which used almost solely to engross consideration, but paid great attention to the proceedings of the Admiralty as supervising these manufacturing departments. The responsibility for them to the House should therefore be undivided; and the advice of the late Sir James Graham in 1860 was, he thought, sound—namely, that the First Lord should look to the business department as little as the head of the Board, and as much as a Minister of Marine, as possible. He would point out one way in which this might be done to great advantage. The Board consisted of two civilians, the First Lord and Junior Lord, and four Naval Lords. The business of the dockyards was specially under the supervision of the First Sea Lord; but the purchase of stores and other incidental matters of that kind were under the management of another Sea Lord. The result was that these two Sea Lords, who might not be Members of that House, and the senior of whom had not been during ten years past, were the members of the Board of Admiralty who were specially concerned in the dockyard administration, and who were practically, over the Controller, the managers of the dockyards. That he would suggest was an unsound system. What were the primary functions of the First Sea Lord? He was what might be called the Commander-in-Chief of the Fleet, responsible for the movement of our squadrons and for the selection of the ships, and he was, so to say, interested in there being as large an expenditure as possible upon the navy. His business was to bring the efficiency of the fleet to the highest possible point; and, however able or honest he might be, the very nature of his functions as Naval Commander-in-Chief could not but incite him to increase the outlay upon ships. The First Sea Lord, therefore, who was in that sense "the spending Lord" as to the fleet, ought not to be the same member of the Board of Admiralty who had the general management of the dockyards, and to whom they must look to carry out the greatest practicable amount of economy. He would recommend that the First Lord of the Admiralty, when he was a Member of the House of Commons, and when not, that the person representing the Board in this House should be what is called the superintending Lord in respect to dockyard economy, and the member of the Board to whom the Controller should look, and whom he should consult in matters concerning the dockyards. If that change were made, and the Parliamentary representation of the Admiralty in that House were directly responsible for the management of the dockyards, he felt sure that the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) and the Controller would be in a much more satisfactory position, and that the House might then expect to see a more economical administration. It also appeared to him, from his experience, that there was a good deal of double action, that although the Controller was made the channel for conveying orders to the dockyards, yet sometimes orders went from the Admiralty to the dockyards without being sent through that officer. That, he thought, was wrong; all orders should go through the medium of the Controller to the dockyard, and he should be entirely responsible for their work. The House should see that there was not a double, or even a treble responsibility as to these matters. With regard to the superintendents of the dockyards, he was bound to state that he concurred to a great extent with the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) as to the inexpediency of the present arrangement, under which no civilian could be the Superintendent of a dockyard, and no Superintendent could hold office for more than five years, while if in the meantime he obtained high professional rank he was at once disassociated from the dockyard. It was not desirable that the civil officers employed in the dockyards should be led to think that they had any right to be promoted to the post of Superintendent; but the Government ought not to be debarred from appointing a good civilian to such an office. And so, also, when a good sailor filled it it was most unwise that as soon as he had learnt his trade he should be "shunted" off merely because he had risen to a higher rank or because his five years had run out. Again, among the officers in the dockyards he thought there were too many grades; and during the year he was at the Board one of those grades—namely, the rank of measurers—was done away with, decidedly to the benefit of the public service. But there were still in the shipbuilding department of the dockyards six ranks—namely, the master shipwright, the assistant master shipwright, the foreman, the inspector, the leading man, and the shipwright, besides the subordinate labourer. There was no private establishment in which it was found necessary to have so many ranks in the hierarchy of administration; and it would be better to reduce them, probably, to four, or at least five. His hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had spoken of the absolute necessity of reducing the establishment; and there was no change which the late Board of Admiralty had carried out with greater success than their gradual reduction of the establishment. What they required to have was a permanent nucleus of skilled artificers, admitting of a large expansion in time of war. But they had a large number of common dockyard workmen still called established who could not be discharged without receiving considerable compensation, and who were entitled after a certain time to a pension. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman opposite would dispose of that class altogether, by letting it die out gradually, and also by reducing a considerable number of the established shipwrights. With respect to the number of dockyards, especially the three dockyards in the Thames, there could be no doubt that they ought to get rid of two of them. Sheerness must be got rid of as soon as the extension of Chatham was complete; and they might, at the same time, perfectly well dispense with Woolwich, and transfer to Deptford some of that work connected with the receipt of stores and machinery that now went on at Woolwich. It would also be most prudent to abandon all shipbuilding at Deptford; and as to Woolwich, he made no doubt that when the depression of the shipbuilding trade was at an end it could be leased at a great profit, and, at the same time, would almost be available for the navy in time of war. A very considerable improvement would thus be effected. By having fewer dockyards, and in that way reducing the unnecessary business that passed through the Controller's Office, they would add to the efficiency of that office; and by reducing the grades of the officers and increasing the responsibility of the principal officers in the yards, they would meet the objections urged by the Commissioners of 1860. And if the principles stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite were fully and fairly carried out by the present Board, the House would have great reason to thank the right hon. Baronet, as well as to thank the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), for having consistently brought forward these Motions for a series of years, by means of which, though with some mistakes—he would not say how many—he had done much good service, and contributed to enforce reforms much needed for the efficiency of the service in the difficult time of transition through which we were going.

Mr. DALGLISH rejoiced to hear the declarations made that night on the subject of the reform of the Board of Admiralty by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord, and trusted that the needful alterations would be effected without any unnecessary delay. The conversion of vessels from one class of ships to another had been often referred to as not having proved very beneficial to the country; but there was another kind of conversion which was, perhaps, equally open to criticism—he meant that undergone by great naval reformers who, as soon as they got appointed to the Board of Admiralty, were found to stand up for continuing things very much as they are. He sincerely trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to carry out his good intentions, for he had no hope that any reform would come from his own side of the House. He was of opinion that every person connected with the Admiralty should be appointed by, and be responsible to, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and that the office of Storekeeper should be entirely abolished. He concluded by thanking the First Lord of the Admiralty for his promise.

COLONEL SYKES remarked that an hon. Gentleman had made a comparison between the naval establishments of England and America, and had drawn a conclusion favourable to the former; but he had not offered a single figure for the consideration of the House to justify those conclusions, and such arguments, therefore, were little better than beating the air. It would be more to the purpose if a comparison were made with a State nearer home, whose naval progress had greatly alarmed many Members on the Conservative side of the House; and from an official report, as regards the constitution and practice of the French navy, which he held in his hand, he found that the head of the French navy was a Minister of Marine, who alone issued orders, who alone was responsible, and who took care that his orders were obeyed. He had the assistance of a Council of Admiralty, in which there are four Vice Admirals with £800 per annum each, a Rear Admiral, a Director of Naval Construction, and a Commissary General, each with £600 per annum. The Secretary has £360 per annum, as contrasted with the English First Secretary at £2,000 per annum. In this Council two Captains of the navy have seats with £200 per annum each, and lodging money. The Minister of Marine has also the assistance of a Council of Works, in which are a Vice Admiral, two Rear Admirals, one Captain of the First Class, and two Chief Engineers for Construction. He has also under him Inspectors of Artillery, Engineers, Infantry, Hydraulic Works, and the Medical Department. The French Admiralty Establishment consists of 318 persons, besides the Councillors, and in 1865 the total cost was £73,036. The English Admiralty in the same year employed 451 persons, and cost £175,957. The Admirals and naval officers who sit as advisers to the Chief Minister of Marine in France must each of them have passed a mathematical examination, while such a qualification seemed to be deemed of no consequence whatever upon our Board of Admiralty. Then at the dockyards in France a debtor and creditor account was kept of all the materials used in the yards, both as regards quantity and value. For instance, 10,000 cubic feet of timber value "so much," are entered on one side of the account on receipt; and when issued for work it appears on the other side of the account, as 3,000 cubic feet value—so much for such and such a ship, or purpose—and such entries enabled the manager of the yard at any moment to ascertain what stock was in the yard by the simple process of adding up four columns of figures. Until new forms were introduced by the hon. Member for Halifax no system of account-keeping worthy of the name was practised in our naval yards, while in India a system similar to that carried on in France had been in use for the past thirty years. As to the cost of our navy compared with that of France, he found that in 1865 the French navy, the activity in which had caused a panic in England not long ago, cost £5,131,826, as compared with £10,394,421 for our navy during the same time. He thought that the manner in which things were now conducted was inconsistent with the interests of the country, and that a good deal of money might have been saved with a little economy, and he believed that the establishment of a Secretary of State for the Navy and the re-organization of the Admiralty Establishment, would be equally conducive to efficiency and economy. Whatever might be the result of the Motion, he was quite sure the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) deserved the thanks of the country for the attention which he had bestowed on the subject.

MR. BASS was of opinion that there was a large body of Gentlemen in the House who regretted the manner in which the naval patronage was abused, every post, from that of a naval cadet to that of an admiral, being filled up by patronage and favour. That, however, was a subject which he should probably again refer to on some future occasion. He might mention, however, an anecdote in which he was personally concerned, which would exemplify the manner in which some of our affairs were conducted. An application was made to him by some gentlemen connected with the Admiralty to allow them to see a manufactory of his for making casks by machinery, and having complied with the request, four or five intelligent and competent men paid a visit to his works, inspected his machinery, and expressed their admiration of it. A very few months afterwards he was invited to inspect machinery put up at Woolwich, and having seen it he considered it was better than his own, and on expressing his surprise that those who possessed such good machinery should pay him a visit, the gentleman by whom he had been invited informed him that his former visitors were connected with the Admiralty, and occupied another portion of the yard. He then ventured to express his wonder that the machinery had not been shown to his visitors, and that they had not availed themselves of its evident advantages, upon which he was told that if the people from the department he was in showed those connected with the other department how to make sawdust into gold-dust, they would still refuse to have anything to do with it. The mode of making contracts for the Admiralty was most defective, and in the purchase of timber and staves he could show them how to save a very large sum indeed. He suggested that the First Lord should consider whether some improvement could not be made in the mode of giving out the contracts.

LORD JOHN HAY did not believe that there was any more apathy in the House now than formerly on the subject of navy patronage; but the fact was that things were no longer as they had been, and it was no longer necessary for the House to exercise that sharp supervision over the actions of the Board that was formerly employed. He wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he would lay on the table of the House the circular issued by Messrs. Ryland, and also the communication of Dr. Percy on the subject of ballast? He asked for the production of the former document, because he was informed that its effect was not exactly that stated by the right hon. Gentleman, and that Messrs. Ryland did not state that they would give £6 per ton for the ballast, but that they wanted 5 per cent for selling it.

MR. OTWAY said, that the interest in the question before the House had subsided to a great extent since the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty had stated that if he remained in Office he should consider it his duty to consult his Colleagues about some important changes. Personally, he regarded as the great fault in our dockyard system the fact that there was no one connected with any of the establishments directly interested in the exercise of economy. He would suggest the encouragement of competition between the different dockyards, and that a premium should be awarded to the men in one dockyard if under similar circumstances they produced vessels at a less cost than in another dockyard. At present every effort was devoted to the production of a superior article, and no attention at all was devoted to economy. The two ships which had of late years excited the greatest admiration were both built at Chatham, and the Wyvern and the Scorpion, which have been so generally decried, were built at a private yard belonging to an hon. Member, who was not then in his place. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would lay upon the table the Report as to the value of the iron. He thought that on this subject there had been some mistake. It must not be forgotten that, although it was now valued at £100,000, the iron had done good service since it had been laid down as a pavement. The heavy weights continuously traversing the yard would have entirely destroyed any pavement of wood or stone. ["Oh!"] He could assure hon. Members that had the yard been paved with stone it would have required continual repairs. Therefore, laying down this iron as a pavement was not such a piece of folly on the part of the Admiralty as the hon. Member for Lincoln supposed. He trusted that, after the statement of the right hon. Baronet that he intended to propose an entirely new constitution for the Board of Admiralty, the hon. Member would not divide the House upon the subject.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON wished to say, by way of explanation, that he was sure the noble Lord (Lord John Hay) did not intend to convey what his tone and words implied—that he (Sir John Pakington) intended to mislead the House. He begged to state that he did not in the least mislead the House. At the same time, he would consider whether it would be desirable to lay the Reports on the table. The report of Messrs. Ryland was brought to the Admiralty by Mr. Ryland, and in conversation with that gentleman he was informed of the real value of the ballast. Dr. Percy also formed a very high opinion of the value of the iron, and in his Report said it was quite as fit to be used for the purpose of making chilled iron shot as that now being used, the price of which was £6 per ton.

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply to one or two questions that had been put to him with reference to the proposed improvements in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, wished to state that the duties of the new officer, the Superintendent of Dockyard Accounts, would rather assist those of the Valuer of Dockyard Works than clash with them. It was the duty of the Valuer of Dockyard Works to examine and report as to the nature of the repairs of ships, &c., and as to the amount that should be expended upon them, while it would devolve upon the new officer to report to the Controller how the money had been expended, and whether it had been so expended in obedience to his orders. With respect to the question whether the present Board of Admiralty had any design to take steps to ascertain whether the sums now voted for the pension fund would be charged to the general expenses of the dockyards, he understood that the Controller of the Navy would be requested to communicate with the new accountant of the yard, with a view to consulting an actuary for the purpose of calculating the deferred annuities which would represent the value of the pensions to each artificer. Then as to the question respecting the sum of £10,300,000, which it was stated had been spent during 1864-5 on the navy. A large proportion of that money was spent on what he might call the dead-weight service, comprising half-pay and pensions, and it should not be forgotten that the Vote for transporting troops from one part of the world to another was included in this sum. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) considered that the Controller must be placed in a position of great difficulty, and of comparative inefficiency, if any orders were issued at the dockyards by other means than through the Controller himself. The right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty had issued stringent orders that no member of the Board of Admiralty was to give any order involving the expenditure of public money in the dockyards without the knowledge of the Controller. One great object had been gained in the course of the night's debate. General testimony had been borne to the great efficiency of the present system of accounts which they owed to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and which would be pushed one step further by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty by the proposed appeal. It was also gratifying to find that there seemed to be an almost generally recognised opinion in the House that no fair comparison could be made between the

Mr. HORSMAN said, there was general concurrence upon another point—namely, that the House was under an obligation to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) for the manner in which he had brought forward this subject, and raised a very useful and most satisfactory discussion. He (Mr. Horsman) came down to the House that evening prepared to offer his best support to his hon. Friend, but he found that he really did not require it, for he was met by the right hon. Baronet opposite in a spirit of such fairness and frankness that he appeared to get all he desired. The right hon. Baronet began by saying that he himself intended to reform the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and that the Duke of Somerset had entertained the same views, and he (Mr. Horsman) thought the evidence given by both of them before the Committee of 1861 did them the highest honour. There could be no better testimony to the judicious manner in which the Motion had been brought forward than was afforded by the fact that they had been addressed by officials of both the present and the late Board of Admiralty, and yet no one of them had construed a word in it into a censure or attack of any Administration. The question was a large one, and nothing appeared to him to show more completely the inherent defects in the system of Admiralty administration than the attacks which were made upon it year after year. Notwithstanding a succession of the able administrators at the head of the Admiralty, not only had there not been a cessation of these continual complaints, but there had been hardly a diminution of them. The right hon. Baronet admitted that the constitution of the Board of Admiralty needed reforming, that there was a defective organization in the subordinate departments, and that there was a want of clear, well-defined responsibility. The right hon. Baronet admitted everything, and so far as he could do in the absence of those he must consult, he promised everything. He did not know what more the hon. Member for Lincoln could desire, and his suggestion to him was, that he should be satisfied with the success he had achieved, and not mar it by pressing his Motion to a division.

Mr. SEELY, in reply to the observations made by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) on the subject of anchors, said, that he had only heard the explanations offered on that point for the first time that evening ; but he (Mr. Seely) had made the calculation that the Admiralty had paid £170,000 more for anchors than they ought, by comparison with specific quotations for Admiralty anchors from four of the first firms in the kingdom. With regard to the market price of anchors, it was self-evident that there must be such a market price. He would not go into details on the subject of the Frederick William, the Cadmus, the Brisk, and the boats, and other matters disputed, and he would only say that it was exceedingly important that there should be no dispute as to the facts ; and he made the offer to the First Lord that his (Mr. Seely's) secretary should meet any Admiralty official, and thoroughly investigate the facts, and if he (Mr. Seely) was wrong, he would apologize to the House for having unnecessarily taken up their time. All he and all the public wanted was to find whether the statements he had made were true or not, and the truth or the contrary should be ascertained by investigation. A great portion of the statements he had made had passed undenied. As to the question whether only naval officers should be appointed Controllers and Superintendents, all that he wanted was that men should be appointed who understood the duties required of them, and who were fit to perform them. Men knowing nothing whatever of manufacturing operations should certainly not be appointed to the management of large manufacturing establishments. The master shipwrights, the chief engineers, and others should have a responsible head over them who understood the work, and who would not be obliged to leave almost everything in their hands. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would give his best attention to these matters, and that his opinions would have great weight with the Government of which he was so able a Member. In conclusion, he begged to withdraw his Motion.

Previous Question and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to assess Mines, Wood Lands, and Plantations, to local rates, explained that the object of the Bill was to put an end to certain anomalies in the law which now existed. Mines, wood lands, and plantations were not at present assessed to local rates, and he believed it to be very desirable that they should be, as the revenue derived from them was great, and there was a considerable percentage of pauperism arising from those who were employed in mines. He cited the case of Ulverston, in Lancashire, where one-fourth of the property in the union was not rated, although it brought in £50,000 per annum, and belonged to people who were best off in the whole community. He also cited other cases of a similar nature which were simple instances of what was going on in a great many unions. Whatever difference of opinion, he added, might exist as to the expediency of legislating with the view to the removal of those anomalies, there could be no doubt that the House had at its disposal all the information with which it was necessary it should be furnished for the purpose. In 1856 a Committee sat, which continued for two Sessions, and in their Report recognising the fact that coal mines were rated to the poor, they said they could not see any reason at all why other mines should be excepted. Evidence was given before that Committee against the principle of rating mines, the owners urging that they should be encouraged by the Government, and that even grants should be held out to encourage people to embark in those speculations ; but when the question was brought before the House last Session he understood the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers) to say that the object might be obtained without legislation, as there was a probability that the ruling of the Judges on the point might be overruled by an appeal to the House of Lords. The exemption of mines from rating was nothing more than a protective exemption of this description of property, and in Cornwall it had had the effect of keeping capital in a stagnant and unproductive state. In other parts of England, where vast mining wealth had been discovered, the exemption was in favour of the richest property in the country. In the Bill which he proposed to introduce, he followed the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade. It would simply extend the law with reference to rating coal mines to other mines. With regard to wood lands and plantations, he proposed that they should be rated on the value of the land upon which they stood. There was great difficulty in any other mode of assessment.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY would offer no opposition, on the part of the Government, to the introduction of the Bill. No doubt there was great justice in many of the remarks of his hon. Friend; but, at the same time, his hon. Friend was slightly in error in saying that the question of mine rating was finally settled. He (Mr. G. Hardy) had reason to believe that cases were now being prepared to go before the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords, with the view of seeing whether the dicta of some of the Judges would be revised. It was notorious that within a year or two exemptions which had been supposed firmly established in the lower courts had been set aside by the highest tribunals of the country, and it might prove to be so in this case. At the same time, it was very desirable that they should have before them any means by which they might get rid of any unfair means of exemption. At this stage of the Bill he would only say that, on the part of the Government, he would not oppose its introduction.

MR. BAGNALL referred to the Report of the Government Inspector of Mines in North Staffordshire, to the effect that the mode of assessing coal mines was most unjust, and yet this Bill proposed to extend that system of injustice. Unless the hon. Gentleman laid down some other principle of assessment, he should give the Bill every opposition in his power. The House ought to recognise the principle that the working of mines was really tantamount to selling the estate piecemeal.

MR. COLVILLE said, that as the representative of a considerable mining constituency, he felt it his duty to tell the hon. Member, who had asked leave to bring in this Bill, that, though it might be discourteous to oppose its introduction, if it resembled in its provisions that brought in last year by the Member for Shoreham, he should offer it his most determined opposition in all its future stages. The hon. Member was entirely mistaken in the view he had formed of mineral property as a subject for rating, and assumed that it could be assessed at its annual value, like land or houses. In this case the value of the fee was constantly increasing, and the income derived from them comparatively steady, whereas in mines the fee, by the exhaustion of the corpus, was continually diminishing, and their profit most uncertain. A mine was really nothing but a terminable annuity, and it would be unjust and impossible to rate it at its annual value, which to-day might be worth thousands a year, and to-morrow nothing. The only sound principle of rating to be applied to mines is to rate the royalty, or dues paid to the lord. On this principle the lead miners of Derbyshire had for years past been rated, the dues being paid in kind, and they thus contributed to the maintenance of the poor and highways, and he believed were even virtuous enough to pay church rates. The mining interest complained that they were unjustly treated in being thus singled out. The whole system of rating was replete with anomalies, and might well be the subject of comprehensive legislation; but no such injustice had been proved in the exception of metallic mines from rating as to warrant special legislation on the subject. The hon. Member who introduces this Bill, though not a Member for a maritime constituency, resided in a county bordering on the sea—he asked him why, if the rating question was disturbed, that shipping should not be rated? What was there that made larger calls on the poor rates than a harbour full of ships? And then came a question on which he (Mr. Colville) felt very strongly. Why should not game be rated? In one union in Derbyshire there were no less than 40,000 acres of grouse moor, which are mostly let for sporting purposes, but of which the tenant of the pasturage pays all the rates, and the tenant of the game goes entirely free, yet the system of game preserving produced much pauperism. He (Mr. Colville) was quite prepared to go into the whole question of rating; but if metallic mines alone were singled out, he should offer the Bill his strenuous opposition.

MR. PEASE thought mines should be rated, because they threw a large population into a district which was specially liable to come on the poor rate, but they ought to be rated on their own basis. He hoped the Bill, if pressed forward, would be made more like that of the hon. Member for Shoreham.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to assess Mines, Wood Lands, and Plantations to local rates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM, Mr. CAYENDISH BENTINCK, and Mr. HENDERSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 33.]

SUNDAY TRADING BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, in asking for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to Selling and Hawking Goods on Sundays, said, the law affecting Sunday trading was universally admitted to be in a most unsatisfactory state. The present law was passed in the 29th year of the reign of Charles II., and was an attempt to make people perform their religious duties by Act of Parliament. It prohibited the selling of all goods on a Sunday, with the single exception of milk. Of course, there were many other perishable articles that it was necessary to sell on a Sunday, but they were omitted. The result was that the law had become a dead letter. The penalties were forfeiture of the goods, and a fine of 5s. for the whole of the day's sales; but as the goods were mostly meat and vegetables, and were generally consumed immediately after they were sold, the forfeiture could not be exacted, while the penalty of 5s. was so small that it was totally disregarded by those who made a profit by vending goods on the Sunday. There was a very strong desire throughout the country for some legislation upon the subject that would place the law on a more satisfactory footing, and he had that evening received a petition to which 10,000 signatures were attached, asking the House to legislate on this question. Before bringing forward the present Bill, he had felt it his duty to go to different places in the metropolis where Sunday trading was rife, and he had found that in the New Cut, Clare Market, Petticoat Lane, and Moorfields there were regular markets for the sale of goods. In proof of the fact that the goods exposed for sale were not restricted to perishable articles, he might state that in Moorfields he had been offered a pair of bull pups, which, he thought, could hardly come within the ordinary acceptation of the term perishable. In fact, Sunday trading was increasing considerably, and if the House thought it worth while to keep the Sunday, regarding it merely as a civil institution, and not from a religious point of view, as a day of rest, it was high time legislation should take place on the subject. The provisions of the Bill he asked to bring in were two-fold. He had endeavoured to specify those trades the carrying on of which it was desirable to allow upon the Sunday, as well as the hours during which certain articles might be sold on that day. The Bill did not touch a question which had been agitated before—the sale of liquors on the Sunday, and its operation would be confined to towns of a population of 10,000 and upwards. A clause imposing on the police the duty of carrying out the provisions, which was supposed to make the measure less desirable than it otherwise would be, had been removed from the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Laws relating to Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, ordered to be brought in by Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, Lord CLAUD HAMILTON, and Sir BROOK BRIDGES.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 34.]

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. Whitbread reported from the General Committee of Elections; That they had selected the following six Members to be the Chairmen's Panel and to serve as Chairmen of Election Committees for the present Session:—Hugh Edward Adair, esquire; William Edward Baxter, esquire; Admiral the Honourable Arthur Duncombe (York, E.R.); Sir Philip Grey Egerton (Chesh. S.); Thomas William Evans, esquire; Edward Howe, esquire.

ANNUITY TAX ABOLITION (EDINBURGH, PARISH OF CANONGATE) BILL.

(Mr. McLaren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Baines.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'LAREN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its provisions were somewhat intricate, and he was therefore obliged to go further into the details than he should have done under other circumstances. The Bill was founded upon the Act which was passed in 1860—in fact, the whole structure of the Bill depended upon the provisions of that Act. The Act of 1860 professed to abolish the annuity tax or ministers' money, which was then levied in Edinburgh. It did so in form, but it imposed other two rates, which were simply church rates, in place of the annuity tax which was abolished. The passing of that Bill was strongly opposed by the inhabitants of Edinburgh, by the corporation, and by all the public bodies of the city, and it was protested against at large meetings of the ratepayers. A petition was sent to this House, signed by 15,000 inhabitants, against its being passed into law; and after the Bill had passed another meeting was held under the presidency of the chief magistrate, at which a solemn protest was agreed to be signed, and this was done by nearly 8,000 inhabitants, declaring that they never would be satisfied with the provisions of that Act, and that they would continue to urge its repeal, until a more reasonable settlement of the matter had been made. This protest, signed by 8,000 ratepayers, included about 4,000 Parliamentary electors of the city. The Act of 1860, he admitted, did effect a beneficial change, financially, in the city of Edinburgh, which would have been important if there had been no evil principles embodied in the Bill. Previously to that time there were five churches, having two ministers each; and the Act provided that those churches should thereafter have only one minister, as vacancies occurred, thus saving all existing life interests. Two vacancies had occurred at the time of the passing of the Act, and three had occurred since; so that, in fact, the Act was now in full operation, and its effect had thus been to save the stipends of these five ministers to Edinburgh, amounting to £3,000 a year. As a mere question of money, this was not of very great importance, as 1*d.* in the pound on the present rental of Edinburgh would produce

£3,000, and in that part of the city where this tax was levied, the same amount could be raised by a rate of 2*d.* in the pound. The Act of 1860 had a number of intricate provisions. It imposed a tax of 3*d.* in the pound to be levied, not avowedly as a church rate as before, but along with, and as part of, the police rate for the lighting, watching, and cleaning of the city. That tax of 3*d.* in the pound, within the limited area, would produce £4,200, and that sum was required to be paid annually to certain Ecclesiastical Commissioners appointed under the Act to be applied for ministers' stipends. Then it imposed an additional rate of 1*d.* in the pound to be levied, not only within this limited area, but over the whole parishes within the municipal boundaries of the city, in place of pew-rents, given to the Commissioners for ministers' stipends. That rate, though small in amount, had perhaps given rise to more opposition than any other part of the Act; because it was so unjust in principle thus to tax two other parishes which were not ecclesiastically connected with the old Royalty of the city. It was to remove these several grievances that the present Bill had been brought forward. The Bill consisted of three parts, the first of which abolished the annuity tax in the Canongate parish within the city of Edinburgh. By some strange oversight, which he could not understand, while the annuity tax was abolished in the richer districts of the city, it was kept up in this the poorest of all the poor districts of Edinburgh. The Canongate parish had a population of 11,653, of whom 2,733 were ratepayers, and 2,312 of these occupied premises under £10 of rent, and only 420 in the whole parish occupied premises of £10 and upwards. The result was, as might be supposed, the tax, although it was 4½ per cent, only yielded on an average of the last five years a sum of about £220 to each minister; and last year, when considerable additional efforts were made, the amount was only increased to £250 for each minister. When the Select Committee was appointed during last Session of Parliament, the ministers of this parish sent a solicitor to London to be examined before the Committee, to state their case and suggest a remedy. That gentleman, on the part of the ministers, suggested that each of them should receive a stipend of £250 during their lives, in lieu of the annuity tax; that one of the collegiate charges should be abolished when a vacancy occurred; and that the single minister should then get £350 or £400 a year. Now, the present Bill proposed to do exactly what had been suggested by the solicitor to the ministers. It contained a provision that they should have £250 during their lives, and that £350 should be given to the successor when a vacancy occurred. So far as he was aware, no objection whatever had been urged against that part of the Bill. There had been no petition presented, and he had received no letter of remonstrance, and there was nothing to indicate that there was anything less than a general and hearty feeling in favour of that part of the Bill. Another part of the Bill proposed to abolish the rate of 1d. in the pound levied, not over the old Royalty, but over the Canongate parish and St. Cuthbert parish. The Bill proposed to abolish this small rate of 1d., immediately on its passing, so far as the two parishes he had named were concerned, because they had nothing to do with it in any equitable point of view; but as the Town Council could not afford to lose all this income at once, it proposed to abolish the other half, relating to the city parish, only in five years. In that way this rate of 1d. would at the end of five years be totally abolished. He had reason to believe that all parties were perfectly unanimous also on this question. The corporation of Edinburgh, as the House knew from the petition which he had just presented, passed, by a majority of twenty-one to thirteen, a Resolution to petition in favour of this Bill. They were willing to do without that rate of 1d., and they could afford to do without it. The petition which he had this day presented showed that 11,000 of the ratepayers of Edinburgh, of whom about one-third were Parliamentary electors, petitioned for its abolition; and even the Conservative and Church paper of Edinburgh entirely approved of the abolition of the 1d. rate so far as the outer districts were concerned. He now came to the third and most important part of the Bill, which related to the abolition of the rate of 3d. in the pound in the city parish, now levied in lieu of the old annuity tax. That rate produced £4,200 a year, and the strongest possible objections were made to that impost. The Bill proposed to secure the life interests of the whole of the existing ministers, but that when three vacancies occurred they should not be filled up again. In the old town there were too many places of worship for the church-going population, and by the saving which would be effected from not filling up those vacancies, and by taking the ordinary church-door collections or free-will offerings, which were at present legally applicable to the relief of the poor, for the miscellaneous expenses connected with the maintenance of the churches, this source of expenditure would be amply provided for. Those expenses were now defrayed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners out of their general funds, which to this extent would be set free for the payment of ministers' stipends. The blue book just delivered from the Board of Supervision showed that these free-will collections, during the last year, amounted to nearly £1,600, and the whole of the church expenses during the last five years, in which they were managed by the Town Council, averaged about £1,700, so that there would be no difficulty in meeting all the expenses he desired to meet. If that arrangement were entered into the funds would be, first the pew-rents, which brought in about £3,800, and there were other small items amounting to between £180 and £190. Then there was an annuity of £2,000 a year payable in respect of certain property which formerly belonged to the city of Edinburgh connected with the harbour and docks at Leith. This property was surrendered in 1838 upon compensation being given under an Act of Parliament, on a valuation made by the Government of the day, and sanctioned by the Report of a Select Committee of this House; and £2,000 of that compensation was given to the clergymen with the consent of the city authorities. The sums he had mentioned thus amounted to about £6,000, for the purposes he had named. There were now thirteen clergymen, and it was proposed to make the number ten, and this endowment of £6,000, obtained from the sources alluded to, would give stipends of £600 to each of them, which was the amount fixed by the Act of 1860. Therefore, the Act of 1860 was complied with in everything except the reduction of those three clergymen. With respect to the pew-rents, he might explain that in 1832, before the Free Church disruption took place, those pew-rents produced £7,539, and the value of the unlet seats was then £2,212; and there was no reason why these pew-rents should not bring in the same amount now. At present they were very nearly £4,000, and he believed they would exceed £4,000 during the current year; therefore, the endowment would be quite sufficient. After the great split took place in the Church of Scotland and the Free Church was established, the authorities from time to time reduced the rates for the pews, and to some extent that reduction had been going on during the last few years; and the result was that persons who worship in the city churches of Edinburgh paid only about one-half of the pew-rents which the people belonging to other denominations in the city paid. Before the disruption there were 9,455 sittings let, producing £7,539; and in 1865 there were 8,518 sittings let, producing only £3,790; so that while the number of sitters had been reduced by only one-ninth part, the amount paid by them had been reduced by one-half. That showed that the fund was of a very elastic nature. Since the Bill proposed to strike off, as vacancies occurred, three ministers, it might, perhaps, be objected that this would cause a deficiency of ministers in the city. The House would, however, be surprised to learn that besides the thirteen endowed ministers in the city parish, there were two in St. Cuthbert's, and two in the Canongate parish, making altogether seventeen ministers; and there were twelve other Established Churches which were not endowed from any public source. He believed a careful scrutiny would show that these twelve churches which were not endowed were more vigorous and more healthy than are those which were endowed. There were thus twenty-seven churches in the city of Edinburgh all belonging to the Established Church, having twenty-nine ministers; but there were other churches holding the same doctrines, subscribing the same confession of faith, and having the same form of government. Two of these bodies were each larger than the Established Church. These were the Free Church, which had thirty-two places of worship, and the United Presbyterian denomination, which had twenty churches, very numerously attended. There were thus fifty-two churches in addition to the twenty-seven Established Churches which were in all respects on the same footing as to doctrine and government. He believed all these voluntary churches, whether taken singly, or collectively, or on the average, were better attended, and raised far larger sums, for the purposes of religion and benevolence, than the Established Church. Again, the Episcopalians had twelve places of worship; there were seven Baptist churches; and the smaller denominations had fifteen, making altogether 113 Protestant places of worship with 129 ministers, in which substantially the same doctrine was preached; and of these, only fifteen were endowed Established Churches. To show how little three ministers would be missed, he mentioned that the whole population of Edinburgh, including not only the city parish, but the other two parishes, amounted at the last census to 168,000. Of these, about 18,000 were claimed as Roman Catholics, leaving 150,000 Protestants, or persons—and he feared there were many such in all large towns—who did not belong to any denomination. Now, it was obvious, as there were 113 churches in Edinburgh, and the Protestant population was 150,000, that there was a place of worship for every 260 families; and therefore no one could stand up in that House and say that the leaving out of three ministers, and three of the endowed churches, could have any appreciable effect on the spiritual interests of the people of Edinburgh. There were three of these churches in which there were only 509 sittings let altogether, while there were 1,435 unlet, and 821 free sittings. Taking all the thirteen churches, there was an immense number of empty sittings. By the last Return there were 4,645 unlet, and 2,280 free sittings. The city parish, in which this rate of 3d. was levied, contained 67,000 inhabitants; the Canongate parish 11,600 inhabitants, with two endowed ministers; and St. Cuthbert's 90,000 inhabitants, with only two endowed ministers. Now, if the two last-named parishes could do with only two endowed ministers, surely ten endowed ministers were sufficient for the wants of the city parish, with its 67,000 inhabitants? Dundee had a population of 69,000, or more than the city parish of Edinburgh, and it had only five ministers. Glasgow city parish had only ten ministers, with a population of 147,000—more than double the population of the city parish. In reducing the number of ministers in Edinburgh to ten they would still be largely in excess, proportionally, of the number of ministers in any other large town in Scotland. He would like the House to understand that these thirteen parishes, sometimes called distinct parishes, were really all one parish—the city parish. The municipality of Edinburgh had added voluntarily, from time to time, a considerable number of additional churches, partly in the hope of getting a large return from their pew-rents; and those churches were built when there were not so many Dissenters as there are now. To prove that all these alleged parishes were, legally, only one parish, it was sufficient to state that there was only one poor-rate levied, and one parochial board to manage the affairs of the parish. The Bill proposed to give the sitters in these city churches a great advantage which they did not now enjoy. The Act of 1860 said that the communicants and elders of these churches might obtain the right of appointing their own ministers on each congregation paying £600 to the Town Council for the privilege. The present Bill, however, proposed to abolish that payment of £600, and to give the right of appointing the minister to the male heads of families and elders of the church as provided for by the Act of 1860. In that way it was calculated that from the people having an interest in the minister to be appointed, they would be sure to select a man of talent and of Christian worth and piety who would work among the poor, and who would devote himself to the interests of the church and people. The result would be that the churches would be well filled, the pew-rents, in place of £4,000 a year, might in a short time rise to a much higher sum, thus affording additional funds for additional ministers, if required hereafter. The money value of the unfilled pews, even at the present reduced rates, was, according to the last Return, £3,232. It had been stated that this was a Bill founded on the principle that there was to be no Established Church. There could not be a more erroneous statement made. The city of Edinburgh was giving up an endowment of £4,000 a year from the pew-rents, which belonged to the city as corporation revenue. It was likewise giving an endowment of £2,000 a year derivable from property formerly belonging to the city, and which was made over to the clergy, by consent of the city, by Act of Parliament. Those two sources of endowment amounted to £6,000 a year. Again, it had been said that £4,000 a year of that sum was derived only from seat-rents, and the fund was spoken of disparagingly as being only pew-rents. But the clergy of Edinburgh brought an action against the Town Council in 1810, to have it determined that those pew-rents belonged to them, in addition to their other sources of income; but it was decided by the Supreme Courts that those pew-rents belonged to the magistrates and council for the municipal purposes of the city; and they were always so received and so applied. Even when they yielded £7,500, they were applied to the municipal purposes of the city, and always thereafter till the passing of the Act of 1860, when they were made over to the clergy. The £4,000 a year thus drawn from the pew-rents, and which might increase to £7,000 in a few years, was as much the revenue and property of the city of Edinburgh as any other revenue or property belonging to the corporation; but by the passing of the Bill there would no longer be any taxation levied for the support of the Church. Within his own recollection the corporation of Edinburgh had expended £80,000 in building three additional churches, and it had also expended large sums in improving other churches; and the Courts of Law very properly held that, as the Town Council always acted liberally in maintaining and extending the Established Church out of the corporation funds, they were entitled to draw those pew-rents, and apply them for municipal purposes. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would agree to the principle of the Bill by allowing it to be read a second time. If, however, it should be opposed on the ground that an alleged contract was made when the Act of 1860 was passed, he was prepared to show that that idea was founded upon an entire misconception, and that no kind of contract was ever made to which the city of Edinburgh, by its municipal authorities, or public bodies, or its inhabitants, were in any way consenting parties.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that the hon. Member who had introduced this Bill had a hard case to prove, for he had to show that the Act of 1860, which professed to deal with this vexed question, had been fairly tried and failed. They had heard from the hon. Member very little about the working of the Act of 1860. Nor had they heard much from him of the state of feeling in the city of Edinburgh, which had been represented in various quarters to be so greatly excited that further legislation on this subject was absolutely necessary. He thought it was shown before the Committee which sat to inquire into this subject last Session, that the feeling of excitement which had been caused did not exist to any large extent, but that, on the contrary, it was confined to a small portion of the inhabitants of Edinburgh. It would, indeed, be a matter of great regret if any Act of that House, but still more if any Act imposing an ecclesiastical impost upon any large and important place, led to great agitation. But he (Sir James Fergusson) contended that the allegation of excitement was problematical, and that it might be shown that there was no real ground of complaint. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the leading features of the Act of 1860, which he now sought to amend, but he did not explain sufficiently to the House the amount of concession that was then made. Previous to 1860, the provision for the ministers in the city of Edinburgh, though not on an extravagant, was on a more liberal scale than the present one. There were eighteen parish clergymen, who were supported out of what was called the annuity tax, and under the provisions of the law at that time they were entitled to sums nominally exceeding, but really amounting to £800 a year each. The Act of 1860 reduced the number to thirteen, and the salary of each to £600 a year; and with the view of lightening the tax to the bulk of the inhabitants, large classes who had hitherto been exempt from it—members of the College of Justice, including the Bench, the Bar, and all branches of solicitors—voluntarily agreed to become subject to it. They had previously resisted attempts to reduce the number of the clergy; but in 1860, for the sake of peace and on condition of greater security being given to the arrangement proposed, they consented to the reduction and to relinquish their exemption. It was thus that the tax on the inhabitants was reduced from 6d. to 3d. in the pound. All the persons upon whom the additional 1d. was imposed, to make up for the pew-rents taken from the municipality and given up to the ministers, were previously contributors to the general city funds, which were charged with the maintenance of the clergy, who held the seat-rents of the churches as security; and the 1d. was imposed to make up the security formerly possessed in the pew-rents for the payment of the debts of the city. The hon. Member dissented from that statement; but it was so stated at the time; and was it not because security was to be increased, and the burdens of the inhabitants reduced, that the reduction in the number and in the salaries of the ministers was consented to and approved by Parliament? It was repeatedly and distinctly stated that the reduction of the number of ministers was acquiesced in simply for the sake of peace and the increased security given to the remaining ministers. And yet in 1867, when the reduction to thirteen ministers had been for the first time attained, and when the Act, therefore, came into full operation, it was proposed to reduce the security for the stipends of the ministers and their number from thirteen to ten. He might fairly ask where was the reduction to cease? There was one matter in connection with the Act of 1860 which the hon. Member might have recognised—namely, the abolition of the most improper machinery by which alone the stipends of the clergy could be recovered. Previous to the year 1860 the clergy had to sue such of the ratepayers as might be in arrear for their stipends, and the painful spectacle was constantly witnessed of a process at law at the direct instance of the clergy; but by the change, under which the city became the purseholders, the clergy were freed from the obnoxious necessity of being obliged to have recourse to law to recover their stipends. If it were true now that a majority of the inhabitants of the city of Edinburgh had to be coerced into the payment of the tax, if it had to be wrung out of reluctant ratepayers, then he (Sir James Fergusson) would admit that its imposition involved injustice and hardship; but there were few refusals to pay, they were made by a small but noisy section, who sought to disturb a settlement to which they had been parties, and there was no real hardship or injustice. With regard to the proposed method of paying the stipends, as the seat-rents were to be supplemented by property of the municipality—the sum it received from Government in lieu of its Leith harbour claims—the clergy would still be paid out of the common fund of the city, with this difference, that the security would be doubtful and the results problematical. It was proposed to raise the seat-rents, or so to manage them that they should amount to £4,000 a year. [Mr. M'LAREN: They are about that now.] He did not believe the House was prepared to depart from the principle of an Established Church, and he doubted whether the members of those religious bodies in Edinburgh, who had been referred to as being independent of public endowments, would be prepared to follow the hon. Member; for the Free Church, to its honour, had never joined in the attacks made on the ecclesiastical endowments which they had voluntarily relinquished, and some of the clergy of that Church had left on record perhaps the most eloquent defences religious endowments had ever received. He doubted whether the churches of Edinburgh were built upon any such speculation as that the seat-rents would provide the stipends for the ministers; because he believed they were intended to be places for the free worship and religious instruction of the poor, and it was required by Act of Parliament that at least one-tenth of the sittings in them must be free. By evidence given before the Committee last year, it was proved that the clergy were careful not to take seat-rents from the poorer attendants, because they believed that in so doing they would defeat the object with which their churches were provided. Although it appeared that in some churches all the sittings were let, yet there was ample free accommodation in the churches which had the largest congregations. It had been said sarcastically that the clergy of Edinburgh preached to empty benches, and an unworthy attempt was made before the Committee last year to represent the congregations as very scanty, by producing the returns of a voluntary census which some of the agitators had taken; but on inquiry it was found that the figures were fallacious, for where the attendance was represented at 200 or 300, there were 800 or 900 in full communion, and congregations were always calculated to include one-third or one-fourth more than the number of communicants, so that the number of the congregation in question would be three or four times what it had been represented to be. The letting of seats was not so much an object with the Established Church as the encouragement of the attendance of those who could not afford to pay seat-rents; it never had, and he hoped it never would be the case, that the taking of a seat should be regarded as a condition of attending church. When that time came, then, the principle of an Established Church would be really in danger. After taking the pew-rents, the Bill proposed to lay hands on the church-door collections which were now applied to the relief of the poor, and to devote them to the payment of the miscellaneous expenses connected with the maintenance of the churches. There was no money more usefully and properly applied than that collected at the church doors, and he should have been inclined to appeal to the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) as an authority against the proposed appropriation of the collections; for in a standard work on the Scotch law he laid it down that considerable latitude was permitted in the allocation of church-door collections, and that the general practice was to disburse them in the form of temporary relief, in cases of sudden and exceptional distress, so as to save the recipients from falling into the ranks of the permanently poor. There could not be a more charitable purpose than thus to distribute relief through the hands of Christian neighbours, in order to save the unfortunate from pauperism; and it would be grievous if the free-will offerings of the people were diverted to any other object. Why was the hon. Member more sensitive to the grievance of Edinburgh than to that of Leith? Had not the people of Leith a better title to be relieved from the virtual payment of £2,000 a year than Edinburgh had to be relieved from the 3d. in the pound paid for the support of the parish clergy? As to Edinburgh having more clergy than Glasgow, so much the worse for Glasgow. [Laughter.] It was no laughing matter that Glasgow had only ten clergy maintained by public funds; for, notwithstanding the great exertions made there by very worthy people to supply the lamentable deficiency of public endowments, it was well known that the result still fell far short of the requirements of the city; and the deficiency of Glasgow or other towns was no argument for reducing the provision possessed by Edinburgh. To lay stress on Edinburgh being one parish for the relief of the poor, and that therefore the endowed churches within its bounds might be reduced, was to say that parishes containing 15,000 or 20,000 people had no existence but in name. The hon. Member closed his speech with a taunt which might well have been spared. He said that if the people of Edinburgh had the choice of their ministers seat-rents would soon rise, and all outside endowments might be dispensed with. Now, he (Sir James Fergusson) would say that nowhere were to be found more pious, earnest, and useful clergymen than in Edinburgh — worthy successors of an illustrious line. Thanks to these endowments, there had not been wanting for the last 200 years provision for earnest and pious men who had done their work in a manner that had redounded to the credit of the Church and the advantage of the people. If the House were disposed to maintain the Act of 1860, which was working well, he thought it would not hesitate in refusing its assent to the hon. Member's Bill. He would not urge, as he might fairly have done, the shortness of the time that had passed since the introduction of the Bill—so that, of the petitions against it, three or four had only reached him since this debate had commenced—nor would he dwell upon the objectionable manner and tone with which it had been introduced; but he was content to rest his opposition to the measure on the faith of the Parliamentary guarantee, deliberately given in 1860, which he hoped the House would maintain, and he therefore moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. MILLER seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir James Fergusson.)

MR. BAXTER said, he supported the Act of 1860 because he entertained the hope, though not a very sanguine and profound one, that it might be possible to set the question at rest for a considerable period. He was aware at the time that a large portion of the inhabitants of Edinburgh were dissatisfied with its provisions; but, considering that the delegates they sent up did not appear to know their own minds in the matter, and did not bring forward any substitute, it was not extraordinary that the House should have acceded to the proposition then under discussion. The sweeping accusations which had been made against those who passed the Act of 1860 were wholly unjustifiable; but he could not agree that the provisions of that Act were to be stamped with the character of finality. It was admitted before the Committee of last year that excitement did prevail in Edinburgh upon this subject, but what was disputed was the universality of that feeling. He was now of opinion that this mixing up of ministers' stipends with police rates had not been successful in attaining the object contemplated, and he therefore thought the hon. Member for Edinburgh perfectly justified in coming forward with an amended proposal. The hon. Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) was not correct in stating that the salaries of ministers were reduced by the Act of 1860 from £800 to £600 a year. Never on any occasion had the amount been more than £600, and they renounced nothing therefore when they agreed to that measure; and it had been distinctly laid down by the Law Courts that the creditors of the city, and not the clergy, held the seat-rents as security. His firm and conscientious judgment was that if they passed the Bill of his hon. Friend, the security of the clergy would be very considerably increased. The main point was this—was the House prepared still further to reduce the number of the clergy from thirteen to ten, and so put a stop to the heart-burnings which existed. It had been asked if this was conceded, where were the demands to cease? The answer was, as soon as the annuity tax was abolished, and not before. Hon. Gentlemen opposite said there had been no time to ascertain the feeling of the inhabitants of Edinburgh; but the hon. Member for Edinburgh had presented a petition this afternoon, signed by about 11,000 ratepayers, being more than half the electors, upon the subject. He could not imagine that there was any doubt that if the Bill passed it would put down the agitation existing, while it would afford security to the clergy, and not be prejudicial to the interests of the Established Church. He therefore thought the House would give the Bill their attentive consideration.

MR. MILLER said, he rose to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ayrshire, because he felt that the principles of the Bill would only give satisfaction to a very small portion of the citizens of Edinburgh, while it would give very little satisfaction indeed to the people generally. In Scotland the Church depended upon rates and local assessments for its maintenance even to a greater extent than was the case in England, and that was a system that he did not think should be done away with. No man had a higher respect for Dissenters than he had; but he believed that this excitement had been stirred up by certain individuals, who were always to be found in sufficient numbers in large communities, ready to seize upon any opportunity of supposed or real grievance merely for the sake of bringing themselves conspicuously before the eyes of their neighbours. After all the hopes that were entertained of peace being restored to Edinburgh by the passing of the Act of 1860, it was too soon to disturb the people again and throw them into a state of excitement. In the inquiry which had taken place before the Committee, of which he was a Member, almost all the witnesses were of opinion that that portion of the assessment levied upon the ships trading to the port of Leith ought more properly to be abolished than the tax upon the houses in Edinburgh. It was unfair and ungenerous to try to undo the settlement which had been come to in 1860, and the people of Leith thought it a great injustice to pass a Bill like this, which would perpetuate the imposts on the ships frequenting their harbour.

Mr. MONCREIFF said, that as he had taken considerable part in passing the Act of 1860, he wished to say a few words. There were several entirely distinct matters involved in the Bill now before the House. One would suppose from the title of the Bill that the annuity tax was still levied in Edinburgh, but the truth was exactly the reverse. The annuity tax had been repealed and abolished by statute, and there was no such thing now in that city. But if the hon. Member had confined the scope of his Bill to the tax in the borough of Canongate and to the tax of 1*d.* in the pound to meet the deficiency caused in the municipal revenue by the abstraction of pew-rents, he (Mr. Moncreiff) would have gladly voted for the second reading in order to go into Committee, where the matters complained of might be easily redressed. When the annuity tax was abolished in the city of Edinburgh it was still left remaining in the borough of the Canongate; and, on the other hand, the new tax of 1*d.* in the pound which was imposed was extended over the borough of the Canongate, which received no relief whatever from the provisions of the Bill. There was therefore some ground of complaint on that score. But as regarded the 1*d.* over the municipality the case stood in a different position. It was absurd to talk of it as an ecclesiastical tax; it had not the slightest ecclesiastical character about it. The state of the matter was this:—Before 1860 the corporation used the pew-rents as part of the ordinary revenue of the city; but in that year those rents were appropriated to the support of the clergy in order to make some amends for the abolition of the annuity tax, and a tax of 1*d.* in the pound was ordered to be raised for municipal purposes. The seat-rents were valued at £1,600 a year, and if the tax now produced much more than was required there was a fair case for redress. Consequently, if his hon. Colleague had confined his Bill to matters which might fairly come within its reach, he would have gladly supported him. If the Bill were lost, he would himself consider whether in the course of the present Session he could not introduce a measure with regard to these two matters, the tax on the borough of Canongate, and the impost of 1*d.* for municipal purposes, in order to give such relief as might be consistent with the spirit of the Act of 1860. But the present proposal went far beyond this, for it would have the effect of taking from the ministers the security for their stipends which was guaranteed by the Act of 1860. He did not mean to contend that legislation upon such a subject ought necessarily to be absolutely final; but he said that those members who had been parties to an arrangement of that description might fairly deem themselves bound to maintain it to the best of their power. As far as he was concerned, he held himself bound in honour to adhere to a compact by which the ministers consented to have their numbers reduced from eighteen to thirteen. But there were other parties to the transaction. The members of the College of Justice—namely, the bar, the solicitors and attorneys, a very large and influential section of the community of Edinburgh, who up to that time refused to waive their privilege of exemption from the annuity tax—consented to have themselves taxed because they thought the settlement then proposed would be final and satisfactory. The House came to the consideration of this Bill under circumstances very different from those of 1860. At that period the annuity tax amounted to 10*d.* in the pound, and was collected directly by the clergy for their own support. They were now asked to deal with an impost of only 3*d.* in the pound, which instead of being an ecclesiastical, was a purely municipal tax. A great deal had been said about the ratepayers; but if hon. Gentlemen reflected, they would see that the ratepayers had not got a very bad bargain by the settlement of 1860. For twenty-five or thirty years Edinburgh had been agitated without being relieved, reaping all the time a plentiful crop of bad feeling and acrimonious discussion, but nothing beyond that crop. The question served, from time to time for political capital, but not a single farthing had been taken off the tax, and no relief given either to the pockets or the consciences of the ratepayers. But now two-thirds of the tax had been taken off, and the impost which was levied was levied, not for the clergy, but for the purposes of the municipality. If he were to deal fairly his hon. Colleague should propose to repeal the Act of 1860, give the College of Justice back their privileges, and restore the ministers to the number of eighteen. But instead of that the hon. Gentleman took the Act of 1860 as his starting point, and endeavoured to make use of it as a lever for obtaining more. The twenty-five years of agitation which it had taken to obtain the Act of 1860 proceeded on the very principles of the settlement which was then made, and those principles were to reduce the amount of taxation by diminishing the number of ministers, to obtain aid from other sources, to give the ministers security for their stipends, and to make any taxation that might be levied taxation for municipal purposes. The principle of the Bill of 1860 was no invention of his, of the clergy of Edinburgh, or of the Members of that House; but it was in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1851, who reported in favour of reducing the ministers to fifteen, and imposing a municipal tax of 5½d. in the pound. The present Earl of Dalhousie in 1852 introduced a Bill founded on the recommendations of that Committee, and was supported by the people of Edinburgh and the Liberal Members of that House, but the Bill was subsequently lost. Lord Advocate Inglis prepared a Bill to which his hon. Colleague, then chief magistrate of Edinburgh, was not strongly opposed, although he could not give it his absolute support, inasmuch as it did not propose to reduce the number of ministers, though it embodied the other object of converting the tax from an ecclesiastical to a municipal impost. That Bill, too, failed. But in 1853, when Lord Aberdeen succeeded to office, he (Mr. Moncreiff) introduced a Bill which proposed to reduce the ministers to fifteen. His hon. Colleague was so well pleased with that Bill that he recommended the inhabitants of Edinburgh to petition in its favour. That Bill was also unsuccessful, principally because the ministers and the other side of the House were not satisfied with the security for the stipends contained in it. Mr. Black also in 1858 attempted to settle the question, and failed. At last, in 1860, he himself again took the matter in hand, and made a proposal to continue the tax for fifteen years, with a view to its redemption at the end of that time. The Town Council of Edinburgh, however, opposed the proposal, and passed a resolution to the effect that they would unanimously acquiesce in a Bill which should enact that, instead of a temporary, there should be a permanent law to make provision for thirteen ministers at £600 a year, and that there should be undoubted security for the stipends. Upon receiving that resolution, he said that if a public meeting were called, and a vote obtained to sanction the proceeding, he was ready to take the matter in hand. A public meeting was held, his hon. Colleague was present, and it was agreed that they would accept a tax of 4½d. in the pound, a reduction of ministers to thirteen, and would give ample security for the payment of the stipends. Upon this he placed himself in communication with the other side of the House; after a good deal of discussion, the proposal was agreed to, the Act of 1860 was passed, and the ministers of Edinburgh were now paid precisely in the same way as those of many other boroughs in Scotland. It was perfectly true that no sooner was it found that they were going to settle the question than an opposition was got up in the city of Edinburgh by the very men who asked him to shape the Bill on the very principle on which he had introduced it. He found from the city accounts that there were from year to year surplus funds arising out of the current income which were applied to the redemption of property. His opinion was that they ought to apply the current income to the current expenditure, and that they ought not to proceed to the use of the current income as so much capital to be employed in the purchase or redemption of property. Last year he found that there was a sum of £3,900 applied in this way. If next year the same surplus should be available the magistrates would not require to lay on the tax of £4,200 a year. In saying this he did not mean to throw out any charge against the members of the Town Council. He believed that they had acted in the best of faith, and that what they had done had been done from a misreading of the real intentions of the statute. He had thus explained the reasons which rendered it impossible for him to give the slightest sanction to the proposition for taking away the security guaranteed to the clergy in 1860; but if he were to go into the details of the Bill it would be equally unfavourable for him to support it. It proposes that the ministers were to be paid £4,000 out of the seat-rents; but the seat-rents last year yielded only £3,700, and out of that sum £1,700 was taken for the maintenance of the fabrics of the churches, so that the ministers only received £1,900. Now, the Bill says that these seat-rents may be so managed as to produce £4,000, for which no reasons are given whatever. Then, it is proposed that for the maintenance of the fabrics, and for cleaning, lighting, and so on, they should lay hands on the church-door collections, if they could get them for such a purpose. He thought it would be a most improper use of them; but did not his hon. Colleague in a moment see that if he were to obtain such an enactment, the contributors would find out other channels for their money if the charities in which it is now spent were closed, and not a single farthing would come into his hands, so that the result would be, while you gave £4,000 with one hand out of the seat-rents, you would take back £2,000 with the other for the maintenance of the fabrics. He would strongly urge upon his hon. Colleague not to persevere with his present Bill, which could only produce one result—the increase of the agitation. If his hon. Colleague would address his mind to a subject which he well understands—the state of the city accounts—and see whether this sum of £4,200 can be liquidated out of the surplus revenue, and without touching the security, he would render material service to the city. He hoped he would not press his Bill, but that he would at once withdraw it. Should he go to a second reading he should be compelled to vote against the measure which he had introduced.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he would remind the House that he had not supported the measure of 1860, and rose to correct a mis-statement of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir James Fergusson). The hon. Baronet said that the opposition to the Bill of 1860 was carried on by a few noisy sectarians. That was not a correct statement. 7,600 of the inhabitants signed petitions and protested against the measure, and amongst those whom the hon. Baronet called “noisy sectarians” were Mr. Douglas, Professor Balfour, Sir James Simpson, Mr. Duncan, and Mr. Cowan, formerly Member for Edinburgh, and several others of equal respectability. He was sure the hon. Baronet would not deliberately designate these men as mere noisy sectarians. The subject was viewed in Scotland like the question of church rates in England. It was not the amount produced by it that gave rise to the feeling against it. The opposition against it was a matter of sentiment, and as such was to be respected. He was sure the agitation would never cease until such a Bill as was now proposed was passed. He therefore gave it his cordial support.

MR. HADFIELD observed, that the principle of the measure was affirmed in the year 1859 on two divisions, in which the majority in its favour was in the first instance 40, and in the second 60. In 1860 there were 15,000 petitioners against the continuance of this impost, and it was so objectionable that when distrains were made on account of the non-payment of the sum demanded there was the greatest excitement, and on one occasion no less than fifty-two policemen were called in to preserve the peace. This was a simple question of the reduction in the number of ministers who received this money from thirteen to ten, and it was only a few even of the Established Churches in Edinburgh which could claim to participate in the money derived from this tax, and it was a singular fact that the congregations attending those churches were in such a position as to be able to ride in carriages. He thought it disgraceful that fifty-two policemen should be employed to assist in levying an objectionable tax of this nature in Edinburgh for the benefit of the comparatively rich portion of the populace.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE remarked, that the hon. Gentleman who last spoke had referred to the agitation which the question had excited, but had not noticed the mode in which that agitation was fomented. Now, the evidence given before the Committee of last year by Mr. Maitland, the sheriff clerk, showed that very inflammatory suggestions were published in some of the newspapers. It was recommended that in every case of distraint a placard should be posted on the door in these terms:—“Provided for clerico-police tax. . . . Who'll buy? Shame! shame! so to outrage Dissenters and religion,” or that a black flag, bearing the notice or inscription, should be suspended from the window. In one instance, moreover, a placard was issued headed “Robbery and religion,” and inviting all who loved justice and hated robbery to attend the sale.

The settlement of 1860 was passed with great unanimity, and was based on terms exceedingly fair. The clergy sacrificed five of their number, and agreed to accept £600 a year, whereas their incomes would otherwise have reached £800 or £1,000, while the members of the College of Justice gave up their right of exemption from the tax in order to promote the peace and good feeling of the city. That object had on the whole been attained; for, though some slight agitation had since been attempted, the more influential classes had held aloof from it, and the fact of a petition bearing 11,000 signatures amounted to very little, it being easy for persons hawking petitions about to get signatures for any object. As for the Committee of last year, it was an utter waste of time, and the proceedings were virtually a duel between the two Members for Edinburgh, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. M'Laren) wishing to throw dirt on the late Lord Advocate, and the latter occupying hours in cross-examining witnesses to show that he was not deserving of censure.

Mr. M'LAREN, in reply, said, that he was desirous in the first instance of giving the most emphatic denial, which the forms of this House would allow of, to the statement which had just been made by the hon. Member for Elgin to the effect that when the Committee sat he endeavoured to throw discredit upon his Colleague (Mr. Moncreiff). They would not find one particle of evidence in the blue book to support this allegation, which had been so unjustly made. Seeing that his hon. Colleague was not present in the House to-day during the period when he had spoken in support of the second reading of this Bill, he had refrained from even alluding to his existence—though if he had been present there were several points upon which he should have touched, but which, in consequence of the non-attendance of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he had, from a feeling of delicacy towards him, omitted from his statement to the House. The hon. Baronet the Member for Ayrshire seemed to think that he (Mr. M'Laren) had spoken disparagingly of the worth and usefulness of the ministers in Edinburgh. He hoped the hon. Baronet would do him the justice to believe that this was an entire misconception. He had known most of the ministers of Edinburgh personally for the last thirty years, and nobody in this House respected them more than he did, and it was not in the least degree in his mind to cast any reflection upon them. He merely meant to say, that when the people should have the selection of their own ministers in these churches the appointment of good men, according to the views of the different congregations, would be ensured, and the churches would be well filled. It was said that the clergy gave up a large portion of their stipend—agreed to accept £600 instead of £800, which they had before received. He believed, however, that it would be found that the clergy had never received more than £600. He denied the accuracy of the statements made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leith, that there was any grievance of which the people of Leith could complain, seeing that the Town Council of Edinburgh had given the clergy, from their own property, this sum of £2,000; and it was therefore quite incorrect to say that it was a burden on the dock dues or other charges leviable by the authorities of the port of Leith. It was a perfectly fair equivalent for the £2,000 a year which the clergy formerly levied as "Merk per ton," which rate was entirely abolished by a clause in the Agreement Act of 1838. This Act was unanimously approved of by the Town Council and inhabitants of Leith, who sent a member of the Town Council to London to assist in getting the Bill carried through Parliament, to confirm the agreement so unanimously concluded, along with himself (Mr. M'Laren), who had been appointed for the same purpose by the Town Council of Edinburgh. It was a mere delusion to say that the people of Leith paid one farthing in lieu of the Annuity Tax. His predecessor, Mr. Black, had been met with the same groundless allegation in 1859, when, according to Hansard, he

"Showed that the £2,000 was the property of the city, which the inhabitants of Leith had no more right to than the inhabitants of Dalkeith." The hon. Gentleman concluded by quoting the opinion of the late Sir George Lewis in favour of a measure similar in principle to the present, observing that he thought that the deliberate judgment of so calm and sagacious a statesman ought upon such a point to be conclusive.

 (Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Coleridge.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, the object of which is to remove certain defects in the Administration of the Criminal Law, said, it contained one or two provisions involving some degree of novelty. The first of these provisions was to this effect—that wherever any bill of indictment was preferred to any grand jury against any person who had not been committed to custody, or bound by recognizance to answer such indictment, and which indictment was ignored by the grand jury, or, being found by them, the accused should be acquitted thereon, and the Court which tried it should think it had been preferred without reasonable cause, then the Court should be empowered to order the prosecutor to pay the just and reasonable costs incurred by the accused. Such a provision would tend to check prosecutions instituted to extort money or from some other improper motive, and it would render it unnecessary for the accused to have recourse to a civil action for redress in respect of a vexatious prosecution. It sometimes happened that when a magistrate had dismissed a criminal charge the prosecutor still persisted in going before a grand jury, and probably on his own evidence obtained a true bill; but when the trial came on before the petty jury, his counsel got up and said there was not evidence to justify his proceeding further with the charge. The second section of this Bill would meet cases of that kind. Again, the Bill also proposed to enforce the attendance of witnesses whose evidence was material to establish the case of the prisoner, and to provide for their subsequent remuneration. Such powers already existed in regard to the attendance and payment of the witnesses required to prove the prisoner's guilt, and for the due administration of justice there should be a similar provision in regard to the witnesses required to prove his innocence. There were introduced into the Bill such checks as would prevent the abuse of this privilege. He also proposed, that when the case for the prosecution was closed before the magistrate, the prisoner, after he was asked whether he had anything to say in his defence, should also be asked whether there were any witnesses he wished to have called. He had known cases in which a prisoner had been committed for trial without his witnesses being called, owing to his ignorance of the forms observed before a magistrate. The prisoner's witnesses, when called before a magistrate, would be bound over to appear at the trial; and the Bill proposed to give the Judge the same power of directing the expenses of those witnesses to be paid as he had in directing the expenses of the prosecution to be paid. The only objection urged against the Bill was that it would involve great expense; but when it was recollected that the people of this country paid millions to secure a due administration of justice, he did not think such an objection ought to carry with it much weight.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Russell Gurney.)

Mr. HURST said, he did not oppose the second reading, but thought that there were some provisions in the Bill which if allowed to remain in it should lead the House to reject it. He alluded particularly to the principle, introduced for the first time in such cases, that the cost should depend on the result of the prosecution. As the Bill stood he thought it would be unworkable. If bills of indictment could be got behind the backs of accused persons by going before grand juries, the best remedy was to do away altogether with grand juries, which had become in the present state of the law not only useless but an incumbrance to the due administration of justice. He had hoped that this Bill would have contained a provision to that effect. As to the proposal that prisoners' witnesses should be paid, the Bill went too far; and it would be unfair for the prisoners' witnesses to be paid while those for the prosecution were not. The Judges' power of directing the payment of the costs of prosecutions required to be enlarged—as, for example, in the case of prosecutions for misdemeanor, and for attempts to obtain money or goods by false pretences. Trusting that the Bill would be amended on these points in Committee, he did not think it necessary for him to add anything further.

Mr. Russell Gurney

Mr. DENMAN said, he agreed that the practice relating to allowing costs for the expenses of prosecutions required amendment. The legislation on this subject was by no means consistent, and had taken place in the most anomalous and accidental way. By various Acts of Parliament costs were allowed in some cases of felony and misdemeanors, but there were many other criminal cases in which the court could not give costs, and this was a favourable opportunity of dealing with this point. As to the Bill itself, it was well worthy the attention of the House, for nobody had more experience of the working of the criminal law than the learned Recorder of London. For the purposes of that measure it ought not to be assumed that grand juries would be abolished; and as long as they existed, especially in that metropolis, there would be a danger of malicious prosecutions. In such circumstances the Judge at the trial should have power to prevent an innocent man from suffering in pocket. Guarded as it was by that Bill, the provision respecting the payment of prisoners' witnesses deserved a favourable consideration, though he must not be considered as pledging himself to all the details of the clauses proposed. The clause, enabling persons summoned to serve on juries in any civil or criminal proceeding to make a solemn affirmation in lieu of taking an oath, when they declared that according to their religious belief the taking of an oath was unlawful, would remove a great scandal from the administration of justice. He congratulated the House that a Gentleman of known Conservative principles had at length come forward to legislate in favour of liberty of conscience in such a matter. If any one on that side of the House had proposed a similar measure, there would probably have been a loud outcry against the proposal, as one of a Radical tendency. On the whole, with some alterations which would be necessary in Committee, he thought this was a desirable Bill.

MR. WALPOLE agreed that the Bill ought to go to a Committee of the House, and suggested a distant day should be appointed for the purpose to give time to hon. Members to prepare their Amendments.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY was ready to accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. There were many things which he should have liked to have included in the Bill, but he had omitted to insert them in order to secure unanimity on certain points included in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the second time, and committed for Wednesday, 13th March.

SUPPLY—SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL SERVICES 1866-7.

Resolution [February 18] reported.

Vote £600, Houses of Parliament.

MR. OSBORNE said, that on Friday last he gave notice of his intention to ask a question of the First Commissioner of Works, but he did not see the noble Lord in his place. However, he would say that his question referred to the accommodation provided in what was called the Ladies' Gallery of that House. The state of that accommodation was so infamous; the ventilation was so bad, that it was positively disgraceful to the House that they should permit any ladies to sit in that gallery, ventilated and accommodated as they were. What he wished to put to the First Commissioner of Works, who had shown a great desire to improve everything connected with the House, was, whether they had not arrived at a time of day when that very unpleasant railing might be removed altogether, and the House of Commons might conduct their debates as the debates were conducted in the House of Lords? He was sure it would be a very great advantage to the ventilation, and also to the occupants of that Gallery. Anybody who would go up to that Gallery when the House was full and the Gallery was full would find it very difficult to sit there. When the Legislature was engaged in improving the sanitary condition of the metropolis he thought they ought also to endeavour to improve the sanitary condition of the Ladies' Gallery. And he hoped that immediate steps would be taken by the First Commissioner to make so desirable and necessary an improvement.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER entirely concurred in the observations of the hon. Member who had just spoken. Last Session and the Session before he (Sir George Bowyer) called attention to the inadequate accommodation of the Ladies' Gallery. It was quite disgraceful. When the House was full, the foul air in the House went up there. Air which had already passed through several hundred pairs of lungs went up to that Gallery and made it perfectly intolerable. He must say also that he did not see any reason why ladies should be shut up behind a grating in that House when in the House of Lords that was not done. He did not see why an arrangement, which was not an inconvenient one in the Lords, should not be adopted in the Commons. He therefore urged on Her Majesty's Government the expediency of removing those gratings which made the House of Commons unwholesome, and the Ladies' Gallery not only unwholesome but also disagreeable.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was not aware that the notice to introduce this subject had been given, as it did not appear on the paper.

MR. OSBORNE: The notice was a private notice.

MR. WALPOLE: I think perhaps the discussion had better not go on. It can be resumed next day on the question of Supply.

MR. BRADY expressed a hope that in any alteration made, an enlargement of the Ladies' Gallery would be included.

MR. BENTINCK wished distinctly to say that he had nothing whatever to do with the £600 to Mr. Cope.

Afterwards—

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had to apologize to the hon. Member for Nottingham for not being in his place a few minutes ago, in which case he might have given a fuller answer to the hon. Gentleman's inquiry. He had been informed that the hon. Member had complained of the ventilation of the Ladies' Gallery, and had asked whether it was not the intention of the Government to take some steps to improve it. As soon as Parliament was prorogued last year he made inquiry into the subject, and he had hoped that some improvement had been made during the recess. If those measures had not been successful in giving free air to the Ladies' Gallery he was deeply sorry. The whole subject of the ventilation of the House was under the management of Dr. Percy, and he would communicate with him in regard to the better ventilation of the Ladies' Gallery.

MR. OSBORNE: Would the noble Lord have any objection to order the removal of the brass rails in front of the Gallery?

UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION AT PARIS.

Vote £50,000, Universal Exhibition at Paris.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he trusted that before the House adopted this Vote they would have some distinct promise from the Government that the whole details of this most extraordinary grant should be laid upon the table. The Vote came before the House by surprise the other night, and there was some discussion, a desultory discussion; but still it was sufficient to show the feeling of the House. He had taken part in it as a Commissioner; but he believed that the occupants of the Treasury Bench and of the ex-Treasury Bench were all in the same boat as Commissioners of the Exhibition. The Commission originally consisted of the Ministers of State, heads of the art and scientific societies, of which he was one, and what were called "representative men." The change of Government led to the new Ministers being put on, while the old ones did not go off, and so they had become a very numerous body. But what had they done? They had been summoned half-a-dozen times to pleasant meetings in the Sheepshanks Gallery, where they sat round a horse-shoe table, admirably presided over by an illustrious personage, and where resolutions out and dried had been submitted to their notice. These might be divided into two classes; some were too simple for consideration at all, while others were altogether ridiculous. In fact, they were treated by the authorities at South Kensington, whenever the latter wanted to smother some monstrous suggestion from Paris, as the cats that were to pull the chesnuts out of the fire. But there was no intelligible account of what the Executive did or did not do in concert with the authorities of France. No balance-sheet or any intelligible general report had ever been placed before them. What the Executive did was done in correspondence with the Imperial Commission at Paris, and the matters were not brought before the Commissioners in London. [MR. OSBORNE: Who is the Executive?] Why, the Secretary of the Science and Art Department—he was the Executive. As an instance of the way things were done he had, as President of the Institute of Architects, and feeling interested in promoting an exhibition at Paris of the best architectural works of our eminent English architects, written in November, 1865, begging that they might be placed in relation with the Commissioners. It took three months before the matter was taken notice of—namely, in February, 1866, and the time for giving effect to the scheme had then almost passed by, and nothing had occurred since but trouble and vexation. The Commissioners would, no doubt, be spoken of as wasters of £116,000 on this Paris Exhibition; but they were no more responsible than was that honourable House. He trusted that before another farthing was voted to the Paris Exhibition the House would have a full statement of the appropriation of the £116,000 laid on the table.

MR. OSBORNE said, that probably the Secretary of the Treasury would lay on the table of the House what he had on a recent occasion volunteered to produce—namely, the correspondence relating to the expenditure of that additional £50,000. Perhaps he would also give them an assurance that the £116,000 would cover everything, and that there would not be a future demand for £50,000 more.

MR. HUNT could assure the House that he quite sympathized with the feeling which that Vote had excited. Indeed, he had experienced all the phases of feeling which the House had exhibited, with some additional symptoms of vexation. His first sensation had been surprise; his next indignation; then he got to protestation; and for some time he had endeavoured, rather ineffectually, to settle his mind in a sentiment of Christian resignation. But he wished to correct a misapprehension which prevailed as to a former expression of his about the responsibility of the Government in this matter. Objection had been taken to his remark that neither the present, nor the late, nor hardly any, Government was responsible in regard to it. Perhaps his expression had been rather too vague. If they took the term "responsibility" in the conventional sense in which it was ordinarily used in that House, no doubt a Government which proposed a Vote was responsible for it. But he ventured to say that if their responsibility was held to be confined to those things as to which they had the liberty of a choice, neither the present nor the late Government were responsible for that expenditure. For, supposing the offers made of space for the Exhibition at Paris of the arts and manufactures of this country to have once been accepted by the English Commissioners, the Government could not then help themselves. He might remind the House that the British Commissioners were appointed in 1865. It was not until May, 1866, they learnt the whole of the conditions imposed by the Imperial Government upon foreign exhibitors. It then became a matter for consideration whether those conditions should be accepted or not. The correspondence would not show the whole of the communications that took place, but it was decided, with one or two exceptions, that the principles laid down by the Imperial Commissioners should be accepted. In May or June of that year officers attached to the Science and Art Department at South Kensington were sent over to Paris by the President and Vice President of the Council in the late Government to make estimates for these works. Before those estimates were completed the change of Government took place, and one of the first things he heard when he became Secretary to the Treasury was that about £90,000 would be required for the French Exhibition. He was much surprised, and protested against the amount, but was told that, the Royal Commissioners having accepted the terms imposed, no less a sum would be sufficient. The first item was for internal fittings £16,100. He was informed that the building, being divided into apsidal compartments, required more expensive buildings than if the edifice had been a square or parallelogram. The remaining items were:—Supplementary buildings and park, £23,065; ancient and modern art, £11,050; management, watching, and cleaning, £14,755; [An hon. MEMBER: It costs more than art, ancient and modern] house and office expenses, £17,190; freight, £8,250; Royal Commission expenses, £2,750;—making altogether £93,160. When the Estimate was presented to his noble Friend the President of the Council he reduced it to the above sum, but he found that not more than £2,000 or £3,000 would be taken off. The difference between the above sum of £93,160 and the Vote of £116,650 was caused by the additional items of £11,490 for the exhibition by Government Departments, and £12,000 for the jurors. With regard to the exhibition by Government Departments, it had been decided that this country would do what other Governments did in this matter. The President of the Council, the Secretary for War, and the First Lord of the Admiralty of the late Government determined, after due inquiry, that the manufactures connected with the army and navy should be exhibited, and since that time some additions had been made by including the department of the Trinity House. These expenses might, no doubt, be slightly reduced, and he was bound to say that the present President of the Council was responsible for the plan by which it was proposed to compensate the jurors for their services; but, as he said before, neither the present nor the late Government were either technically or morally responsible for the expenditure. The hon. Gentleman had asked whether he (Mr. Hunt) could assure the House that this Vote of £116,650 was all that would be asked for. It was impossible for him to give any pledge of that sort. All he could say was that the fault would not rest with the authorities of the Treasury if the expenditure were exceeded, for every means had been taken to urge upon those who had the spending of the money, the necessity of not going beyond the limits of the Vote.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to know whether he was to understand that the War Department intended to exhibit the arms made at Enfield out of the funds supplied by that House? The small-arm manufacturers of Birmingham always wished to compete with Enfield, and it would hardly be fair to them if Enfield were to exhibit as a manufacturing establishment at the expense of the public.

MR. BENTINCK complained that the House had not yet had explained to it who really was responsible for this expenditure. His hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) had told the House that he was a Commissioner and attended the meetings. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed that he also was a Commissioner, although he had never attended a meeting. It was highly desirable the House should know who was responsible for this outlay.

MR. CORRY: Early in the course of last year the question had to be considered whether the Departments of the army and navy should exhibit at Paris; and on the 19th of February the Royal Commissioners recommended that the Government of this country should follow the example of other countries; and as it appeared that Austria, Prussia, and other States were going to exhibit munitions of war, it was settled that Great Britain should do so likewise. It was necessary to provide accommodation for these articles, which were of a very bulky character. It was arranged that buildings should be erected for their reception and display—a boiler-house, a testing-house, a building for barrack articles, for munitions of war, and another large building for agricultural machinery, and various other buildings. The principle that all these buildings should be erected at the expense of this country, in the same manner as similar buildings were to be erected at the expense of other exhibiting countries, was sanctioned by the late Government, and when the present Government came into office all they had to do was to determine what sum to ask for the construction of these buildings. The Duke of Buckingham took the greatest pains to reduce these Estimates, and but for his exertions they would have been considerably higher than the amount now asked for. The late Government had either to do what they did or withdraw from the competition altogether. In his opinion, they wisely determined not to withdraw, and the present Government had done no more than come to a similar decision.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that no answer had yet been returned to the simple question, where did the responsibility for this expenditure lay, since it was disclaimed both by the present Ministers and by the former ones? He wished to know who the subordinate officer was who had conducted the correspondence on the subject, and had thereby incurred this expenditure; who was the man, what was his name, and how was it that all the responsibility rested upon him?

MR. WALPOLE: There is no great difficulty in answering the question of the hon. Baronet. The incurring of the expenditure depended upon whether England should or should not, like other countries, exhibit in the French Exhibition. When that was once determined in the affirmative, England was of course put upon the same footing as other countries with regard to expenditure. As long ago as February, 1866, it was determined, on the part of the French Government, that certain expenses should be incurred by exhibitors, and when it was determined that this country should exhibit, the question of amount depended upon the conditions imposed by the French Government. Well, this being settled, the precise amount of the Estimate was, of course, to be determined by the Ministers for preparing the Estimates to be laid before the House; and this was done by the late and not by the present Government.

MR. DYCE NICOL hoped that the French Government would duly appreciate the generosity of the English Government on the present occasion, which was a strong contrast with the spirit displayed in 1862.

MR. SCOURFIELD observed, that the question put by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) had not been answered—namely, who were the responsible parties for the proposed expenditure?

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE remarked, that not only had no answer been given, but the House had been told that neither the present nor the late Government were responsible. The House had a right to know by whom the expenses had been authorized. It was a contradiction to say that when the English Government determined to exhibit they necessarily incurred this expense. One of the Commissioners had stated that whenever he attended the meetings there was no practical business brought before them. It appeared that there was some one behind the scenes who was spending all this money. Another question was, who was to be responsible for the future? He hoped the House before voting such an enormous sum would be satisfied on these points.

MR. HUNT said, he had already stated that the late President and late Vice President of the Council sent to Paris officers of the Science and Art Department. [Mr. OSBORNE: What officers?] He believed they were engineer officers, and they were sent to make estimates for certain works in accordance with the conditions imposed by the French Government. These estimates were submitted to the President of the Council (the Duke of Buckingham) after he had accepted office, and who accepted them subject to certain modifications. The estimates were prepared on the authority of the late Government, and, with some modifications, accepted by the present

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was clear that if this country exhibited at all a certain amount of expense must be incurred. It was not to be expected that we should exhibit according to the conditions laid down by the French Government and then refuse to pay. He thought that the answer given by the Secretary of the Treasury was satisfactory as to the course that had been pursued. Officers had been sent over, not to spend the money, but to prepare Estimates, and their Estimates had been approved, subject to certain modifications. It was not said that, looking to the objects to be attained, these Estimates were extravagant. [Mr. OSBORNE: Yes, I say so.] The item for fittings could not be said to be extravagant. [Mr. OSBORNE: No; the item for management.] With regard to any future expenditure, the existing Government would not authorize any outlay without first approving the Estimates for such expenditure.

CAPTAIN GRIDLEY said, it was clear that no future expense could be incurred except under the responsibility of the Government, and he trusted that they would defer to the feeling of the House by giving an assurance that they would not allow any further expense to be incurred beyond the present sum of £116,650. He considered the item of £14,755 for management enormous. Then, with regard to the charge of £12,000 for jurors. No such charge was made for the Exhibition of 1862, and he wanted to know why £12,000 should now be paid when our own jurors received no remuneration. It appeared that part of the money had gone for planting trees and laying out gardens. He did not understand that this was part of the necessary expense of an Exhibition, any more than gilding the stalls or enamelling the counters would be, and could not see why such charges should fall on the taxpaying people of this country.

Mr. THOMSON HANKEY hoped that it would not go forth to the country that the House had asked Her Majesty's Government to give any pledge on the subject. How was it possible to know whether the Estimates might not be exceeded? Those who had given the orders were bound to pay for carrying them out.

Mr. DILLWYN hoped the Government would give an answer to the question which had been put respecting the £116,650. The request was a most reasonable one, and it was high time some stop should be put to the expenditure.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it was difficult to give the assurance asked for. The Government had revised the Estimates with the greatest care. They had cut them down as low as possible, and he did not expect there would be any excess beyond what would be covered by the present Vote. It was an unusual course, however, that they should be bound by any specific pledge that the Estimate should not be exceeded under any circumstances; and all they could say was that so far as it was in their power the Estimate should not be exceeded.

SALE AND PURCHASE OF SHARES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. LEE MAN rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law in respect of the sale and purchase of Shares in Joint Stock Banking Companies. The joint-stock banking companies of this country were themselves the creation of Parliament, and they were entitled to the protection of the House. The object of this Bill was to render it imperative on any one who entered into a contract for the sale of shares that he should specify the particular share or shares sold by their particular numbers.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE had no objection to the introduction of the Bill, but the Government would reserve their opinion upon it until the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law in respect of the sale and purchase of Shares in Joint Stock Banking Companies, ordered to be brought in by Mr. LEE MAN, Mr. WALDEGRAVE - LESLIE, and Mr. GOLDNEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 38.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD NAAS, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to renew, for a short period, the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act (Ireland), said: I think it will be more convenient to the House if I make the statement, which it is, of course, necessary to make, to-morrow in moving the second reading of the Bill. Therefore, if it meet with the approval of the House, I will content myself with making this Motion, reserving the statement until the second reading, which will be placed first on the Orders tomorrow.

MR. BRADY said: Sir, I rise to express my entire approbation of the course proposed to be adopted by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I think it is necessary he should have the powers he asks for, and I feel satisfied that the powers to be vested in the Executive in Ireland, will be exercised wisely and to the advantage of the country. I do not, however, wish it to be understood that, in supporting the renewal of this measure, I wish it to be thought that I consider the people of Ireland disloyal, because, on the contrary, I believe that they are truly loyal—loyal to the heart's core to the Throne and Constitution of the United Kingdom. I believe, however, that there is in Ireland a certain amount of discontent, which is natural to the people from the circumstance of their social condition, and it is my firm conviction that if they were raised in the social scale they would be not only as loyal, but as peaceable a people as could be found on the face of the globe. But, Sir, I wish to state that the chief object which I have in supporting the measure of the Act for suspending the Habeas Corpus in Ireland is, that the Government shall have the power to deal with those emissaries who are sent from America by designing and corrupt persons to raise the spirit of discontent in the country, and who, unhappily in a few cases, have had the desired effect. I hope and trust that if any of them are found committing any act contrary to the spirit or law of the country that they will be taught a lesson which they will never forget. I before said the people of Ireland are discontented, and I may add that their discontent arises, not from any disposition on their part to disobey the law, but because their social condition is inferior to that of any other people in the world. There, in the 19th century, with telegraphic communication to every town which brings them information with respect to the happiness, wealth, and prosperity of every other nation in Christendom, they find that they are the poorest, the worst fed, and the worst clothed of all the nations of the earth. This reflection cannot but be the cause of much of the discontent which exists in Ireland; but I have great hope that this state of feeling will not much longer continue to exist, because there are some circumstances which augur well for the future of the country. I find that a Conservative Administration, while calling for measures of repression to support the Constitution, are at the same time bringing forward a measure of a different character calculated to alleviate the condition of the people. I hope that the Bill, which was brought in a few nights since by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland for the improvement of the land, will be carried out with a spirit of forbearance and concession on both sides of the House; and, if so, I believe it will not only confer great benefit upon the country, but will reflect the utmost credit upon the Government. I repeat that it will reflect credit upon the Government, because it shows that they have the manliness to bring forward remedial measures at a moment when a measure of repression is also necessary, and it shows that the spirit by which they are influenced is very different to that which formerly animated them. I thank the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland for having introduced the Land Bill in the interests of peace, and I beg to assure him that it will afford me satisfaction to give him my support on the present occasion.

MR. COGAN said, he could not allow a Bill so important as this to be introduced without expressing his deep regret at the necessity for it. It would be a very bad precedent to let it be thought that a Bill of this nature, suspending the Constitutional liberties of the people of a large portion of the United Kingdom, could be allowed to be brought in as a matter of course; and he felt that nothing but the most imperative necessity would justify the Government in introducing such a measure. He regretted to say that he feared the Government would be able to make out such a case as would justify them in the course they had adopted; but he must express his feeling that it was humiliating to the House and discreditable to the country that after so many years of connection between England and Ireland it should be necessary in 1867, for the tenth time, he believed, since the Union, for the Secretary for Ireland to be compelled to ask for the suspension of the Constitutional liberties of the people. That was a condemnation of England's government of Ireland. It was no use to say that that pestilential conspiracy which was blighting that country, destroying every commercial enterprise and its material improvement, had its roots in a foreign soil; it should not be forgotten that the seed from which these roots grew came from those of the Irish race who, banished from their own homes, had gone to another country where they had obtained that permission to live and prosper which, by means of the defective state of legislation, they were unable to obtain in their native country, and that they carried with them those feelings of resentment and animosity to this country which was now becoming such a source of difficulty and danger. It should be borne in mind they would have no material to work on if there was a contented population left in Ireland. Almost all classes in Ireland were unanimous in condemning the Fenian movement, which had its root in a foreign country, but which would not have become so formidable even as it had, had it not been able to feed on a discontented population at home. One cause for the existence of that discontent was to be found in the relations existing between landlord and tenant in Ireland, which were extremely unsatisfactory, and in dealing with which he regretted to say he thought the measure which had been brought in by the Government a few evenings ago would turn out to be entirely illusory. He was, at the same time, happy to believe that considerable good would result from its introduction, inasmuch as both the great parties in the House were now committed to the opinion that the Irish land difficulty must be faced, and, if possible, solved by means of legislative enactment. Absenteeism was another of the great sources of the unhappy social condition of Ireland; and the position of the Established Church naturally produced great dissatisfaction and irritation. That was a question which must soon be settled, and the sooner the better. He believed it to be the most important of all, and to be at the root of all the evils of Ireland. There never could, there never ought to be content there until there was perfect religious equality, which could never be while there was an Established Church, and that the church of a small minority of the people. Until those questions were settled we should never have that unity between the two countries which, in a national point of view, it was so desirable should exist. He could not allow a proposition to be passed for further suspending the liberties of his country without entering a protest at the manner in which Ireland had been treated. They should take the matter into consideration in a national point of view. England, Ireland, and Scotland united could maintain the prominent position which they had ever held in Europe; but a discontented population in Ireland would prove the weak point in the armour of England. Remove all just causes of discontents and they need not fear for the future for the peace or prosperity of Ireland, which was amply endowed by nature with every element to make a great country. If they did this they might despise these mischievous and pestilent efforts which otherwise would be continued to be made to endanger the peace, and would, and were, preventing its progress and improvement. He rejoiced, as did not only all those in that House, but all who were entitled to respect and consideration of every class and creed in Ireland, at the prompt and easy suppression of that miserable attempt at rebellion which had taken place in the south-west of Ireland. Those engaged in it deserved to be treated mere as lunatics than as criminals; but while he trusted justice might be tempered with mercy, as he had no doubt it would, to the wretched dupes of those dangerous and designing men who had invaded the country, it was to be hoped that those who had so criminally led and misled these credulous people into outrages which could only have such unhappy consequences to themselves, and inflict such ruin on their country, might be taught a lesson which would preserve us from a repetition of these attempts. He would conclude by warning them that—however easy it might be to deal with these dangers now—until they removed every just cause of discontent in Ireland there was danger in the future; and that on another time, if by any chance, which God forbid should occur, there might be a war between this country and America, that discontent in Ireland would be the danger of their common country, which, therefore, if on no higher influence than on the score of justice, would be sufficient enough to induce every patriotic citizen to endeavour promptly to remove.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought this was an occasion to call attention to the way in which the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy of Ireland had exerted their influence for the preservation of order. To their interference might be attributed the little damage that had occurred through means of the Fenian organization. Bishop Moriarty had stood forward in his cathedral, in the centre of the late outbreak, clothed in his ecclesiastical vestments, and acting in the spirit of Christian fearlessness had denounced the insurrection. In like manner the Rev. Father Maginn had warned his flock against joining the insurgents. When they came to the discussion of questions affecting the welfare of the Irish people, the House should recollect the time when the efforts of the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy were exerted for the suppression of outrage in that country. To the Catholic clergy it was due that this insurrection had not spread or taken deeper root in the country.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES BILL.

(The Lord St. Leonards.)

(NO. 3.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, having first presented Petitions signed by masters in the building trade, and every description of labour in that trade, from Birmingham, Manchester, Stockport, Blackburn, Coventry, and other large manufacturing towns, said, that the main object of the measure was to establish Councils of Conciliation to settle disputes between masters and their men. The Bill had been very carefully framed and considered, and was approved of by delegates from the various trades that would be affected by it, and he ventured to believe that its passing would be attended with good results. In any case, the measure could do no harm, because it was altogether of a voluntary nature, and no courts could be established under its authority without the consent of the Crown. It was supposed by some that its leading features had been borrowed from the French system, but the powers of the Crown in England and in France were very different. In France the Emperor has the power to appoint and to remove the President and Vice President. No such power would be submitted to or sought for in this country. But the Cours de Conciliation was borrowed from the French Code, and had been found to work admirably. Anything which legislation could do to increase and confirm the co-operation and friendly relations of labour and capital ought to be attempted; and he believed there now existed as strong a feeling on the part of the operatives for some conciliatory measure of this kind as had been avowed on the part of the masters. The details of the measure being already familiar to their Lordships, he would do no more than move the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(Lord St. Leonards.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the Bill, the object of which was admirable, proposed to extend the provisions of some thirty previous Acts to the enforcement of awards made by these new Councils. He wished to know how far the powers of enforcement were extended by this measure?

LORD CRANWORTH desired to call their Lordships' attention to the terms of a provision enabling the Councils, with the consent of both parties, to fix a rate of wages that should be binding on employers and employed for a period not exceeding twelve months from the date of the order. If the parties were not bound to remain with each other for twelve months, the order would be nugatory; and, if they were, such a regulation might be attended with injurious consequences.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, the Bill did not affect the provisions of the existing law on the subject referred to by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll). As regarded the rate of wages, it was a question which he himself approached with considerable hesitation. The Bill originally contained no such power. The men and also the masters wished future wages to be within the power of the Council, but he objected to it, as he did not think that if, by the action of supply and demand or other circumstances, it should appear that the rate fixed was below what the market would have supplied, the vast body of men spread throughout the country would submit to the award, and if litigation were resorted to, the benefits of the Act would no longer operate. But upon further reflection, which he had promised the delegates to him from 100,000 operatives, he thought such a power limited to a year might safely be given, and therefore he added it to the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR proposed that the title of the Bill should be altered to "Masters and Workmen" instead of "Masters and Operatives," not that anything material depended on the title, but simply because "workmen" was a good old English word, more accurate, and was used throughout the Bill itself.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

LIS PENDENS BILL—(No. 6.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD ST. LEONARDS moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which is to amend the Companies Act of 1862, and also an Act passed to simplify and amend the practice as to the entry of satisfaction on Crown debts and on judgments. The noble and learned Lord said, that the Companies Act contained a clause that petitions for winding up a limited company should be deemed a lis pendens within the Act, requiring every lis pendens intended to bind a purchaser to be registered. Now this was a simple mistake. To constitute a lis pendens, the litigation must be for the particular estate, and the proceeding under the Companies Act bound no portion of a shareholder's estates. The Registry Act did not create a lis pendens, but only required it to be registered in order to bind a purchaser. After the passing of the Companies Act, a lis pendens was registered against the company. This, of course, was inoperative. It bound no man's estate; and consequently such a registry was treated by the profession as of no validity. It then became usual to enter a lis pendens against every individual shareholder, whose estates it was desired to bind. This led to serious inconvenience and complaint, as it prevented the shareholders from dealing with their estates, although the registry was considered to be inoperative. His attention having been drawn to this difficulty, he had a draft of his Bill repealing the obnoxious clause on his table, when an application was made to one of our Courts of Equity by a shareholder who had had a lis pendens entered up against him under the Companies Act to vacate the registry, but this was refused; from this order an appeal was made to the Lords Justices, and they decided, and in his opinion rightly decided, that the registry was inoperative, and reversed the decision of the Court below. Still, the clause which has created so much difficulty and led to such adverse judgments remains in force, and therefore it is proposed by this Bill to repeal it.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(Lord St. Leonards.)

c. 89, would be unnecessary. In the Companies Act of 1848 there was a clause which enacted that the registration of the winding-up petition of a company should constitute a lis pendens, and the creditors of companies had most absurdly, as it appeared to him, been in the habit of registering the winding-up petition against the shareholders, as if the petition constituted a lis pendens, as to the separate property of each of them. That question had been set at rest by the judgment of the Lords Justices in a recent case, in which an application was made by the official liquidator to register a winding-up petition against an individual shareholder. The Master of the Rolls, to whom the application was made, declined to interfere, but did not express any opinion at all on the effect of the registration. There was an appeal to the Lords Justices, who stated in the clearest and most distinct manner possible that it was absurd to imagine that the Legislature intended to allow registration of lis pendens against the estate of a shareholder so as to make persons dealing with him liable to all the penalties attending the dealing with property in litigation. With regard to the clause which made a registration of the petition for winding-up a lis pendens against the company, such a clause appeared to him to be of little value, because it did not seem likely that a person would deal with a bankrupt company whose books and other effects were all in the hands of an official liquidator; but, knowing the decision of the Lords Justices, it appeared to him to be unnecessary to repeal a clause which had been in existence since 1848.

LORD ROMILLY desired to remind the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that a lis pendens was never registered against a shareholder until an order of the Court had been made, which had the effect of a judgment for the payment of money; but the Lords Justices, though they would not allow a lis pendens to operate against the property of an individual shareholder, expressed an opinion that there might be some cases in which it might be necessary to do so. He thought that the second clause of the Bill would, in some respects, be beneficial in its operation.

LORD ST. LEONARDS had already stated the original order by his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Romilly) and the reversal of it by the Lords Justices, but still the difference of opinion remains, and an appeal will lie to this House. The repeal of the clause will set everything right. His noble Friend opposite thinks it should be repealed, and the Lords Justices agree that the Act should be altered. He had been in communication with all these learned Judges. The remedy is the repeal of the clause.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION BILL.

(The Lord St. Leonards.)

(NO. 10.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he had observed with satisfaction that since the Act passed this House last year, the auctioneers had in many instances announced in their conditions that a bidding was or biddings were reserved; and he himself was aware in several instances that this had led to no inconvenience. Now this was of the essence of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(Lord St. Leonards.)

LORD ROMILLY regretted that his noble and learned Friend had not, in the present Bill, as he suggested last year, extended the measure to all sales by auction. He had been informed that the sales of tea alone in the City of London amounted to a much larger sum than resulted from all the sales of land which took place in the metropolis. There were many evils arising in the sales of personal property, of which he would give their Lordships an instance. He had been informed that the sale of some private property of a nobleman, a Member of their Lordships' House, realized £120, and the same property was two hours afterwards sold for £1,200 by auction among the dealers. That was an abuse which ought to be put an end to; and there were other evils, such as the supply of liquor, which also ought no longer to be permitted. He regretted that the Bill dealt with the subject of sales by auction in a piecemeal manner; he should not, however, offer any opposition.

LORD ST. LEONARDS begged to assure his noble Friend that he had bestowed great attention upon the subject of what was termed knockouts, and the result was a conviction that no legislation was necessary. In regard to sales by auction, generally of chattels, sellers had only to appoint respectable auctioneers with firmness enough to put a stop to any improper conduct in the auction-room by brokers or others. To stop one abuse it was not seldom that one of the conditions of sale gave a power to the auctioneer to refuse to take the bidding of any bidder, and any attempt to intimidate or to damage the sale by false statements in the room an energetic auctioneer can at once stop, and if need be have the offender turned out of the room. Still you will find that sales of common articles, according to the statements of auctioneers, would hardly fetch anything like their value without the biddings of brokers. In regard to articles of value to which his noble and learned Friend had referred, they required no legislation. Take, for example, a sale of articles of value, which in the ordinary course of sales would fetch a fair price, but there are one or two articles of great value for which few bidders would be found, and which by a combination of dealers might be knocked down at an almost nominal price, the owner has only to insert a condition that upon a few lots, or naming the lots, a bidding will be reserved, and the combination can do no mischief.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

RESOLUTION.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to move the Resolution—

"That in the Opinion of this House, in any further Scheme to amend the Reform Act of 1832 and increase the Body of Electors, it is not desirable or necessary that all Boroughs should return Members by the same Qualification."

said, that a few words as to the moment at which we have now arrived would, he thought, suffice to explain the course he had pursued and recommend it to the leniency as well as judgment of their Lordships. A train of circumstances, too long to be recounted and too recent to be unknown, had forced upon the country the question whether power should be transferred from the middle class to the numerical majority. The question would be gravely influenced if not finally determined by the Bill the present Government initiated. After the 25th of February, so far as we can estimate the future, their line of action would be settled; and not only they, but the country would have entered on a path they could not afterwards relinquish. In that case deliberation would be over. The present time was ours, and it would rapidly escape us. If it should turn out that our policy is not as yet to lodge the power of the State in the numerical majority, the Resolution he proposed would point out to them the single mode by which, as things stood, they could avoid that consummation. At least it was on that ground and in that sense he had proposed it. No doubt it might be said that a longer notice was desirable. But noble Lords will see at once why it was not given. The noble Earl the late Prime Minister was coming down on Monday to move for certain information on the franchise. A debate upon the question was anticipated, and up to that time no one else would feel at liberty to call attention to any portion of the subject. The notice disappeared on the very day when noble Lords had come there to discuss it. It was scarcely possible that any other should be given until Tuesday. Thursday was the only vacant day before the 25th of February, after which the line of reasoning he had to offer might be in vain submitted to their Lordships or the country. He felt the greater obligation to convey in language, however inexact, what, after months of toil, occurred to him upon the subject; because a Commission of Inquiry on the franchise which the noble Marquess near him (the Marquess of Clanricarde) and himself had urged upon the Government at the end of last Session might, perhaps, have been much more effectually advocated. It was now so clear that one great source of complication would arise from the want of an authoritative document to enlighten the world at large on certain new conditions of the franchise, that he could not quite defend the course which the noble Marquess and he together had adopted in forbearing to bring on a regular debate on that proposal. The want of a Commission, he feared, would render it impossible to resort to one method of adding to the body of electors and yet averting the supremacy of numbers. It was more essential, therefore, to recommend another to their Lordships if the supremacy of numbers was not the object of our policy. The question, whether it is or not, Governments have usually evaded; but without some reply to it, we cannot advance a step in representative Reform or give any kind of counsel on the subject. No means can be adopted or proposed until the end has been determined. But on this great preliminary issue the verdict of the country does something to facilitate an answer. In 1848, when Europe was submerged under the wave of revolution, the Democratic party forced the question before Parliament. It agitated as it occupied society, and for a time, perhaps, there was a balance of opinion. But when the moment for decision came, in June, 1848, Parliament and the public ranged under the banner of the noble Earl, at that time Lord John Russell, and resolved that the proposals of Mr. Hume, by which numbers, or the largest class, were to be supreme over elections, should meet an unequivocal resistance. In 1849 the same battle opened, the same conclusion was arrived at. In 1850 the decision was renewed, and it cannot be said, as far as the country goes, to have been subsequently shaken. No General Election has disturbed it. The Ministerial engagement of February 20, 1851, cannot be said to have altered the position of the country. The series of Bills, which since that epoch have been withdrawn, repudiated, or defeated, can hardly be described as a reversal of the judgment on the broad question Mr. Hume so frequently submitted to the Legislature. Up to this moment the Empire seems to have pronounced that the supremacy of numbers is not the object of our policy. The question, whether it ought to become so, must open vast considerations unless one seemed at present to determine it. If it were not for that one consideration many feelings would incline me to concur with those who are demanding the change in the seat of power to which I have referred. The social welfare of the largest class appears to militate against it. The social welfare of that class must, in a great degree, depend upon the rate of wages. It is a long established truth that the rate of wages is determined by that relative amount of population, and of capital, of which the class receiving wages are themselves the arbiters. The State can do but little to promote the economic virtues which go to influence the labour market, as the effect of schools is rapidly obliterated. It has one other means at its disposal. The franchise may be so adjusted as to reward the industry and stimulate the prudence of the working man by making civil rights the goal of his exertion. But this process is impossible when it requires no exertion upon his part to reach the body of electors, and where the franchise descends to him instead of his being drawn upwards to the limit. The political supremacy and social welfare of the working class appear irreconcilable. If the greatest happiness of the greatest number is pursued, it is not by giving them, in all boroughs, an electoral majority that we can ever hope for its attainment. On this ground alone, which it appears impossible to strengthen, however easy to support, the State could hardly feel entitled, unless an overpowering necessity was seen, to transfer the ruling power to the numerical majority. But if that transfer could be justified by some new considerations not yet established or explained, at least, what I would now suggest may be conceded by all parties. It is that such a mode of government ought not to be embraced without a resolution to embrace it, and that we ought not to reach a new and pregnant form of national existence without intending to arrive at it. When a noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon), whom I now see in his place, told your Lordships years ago that we were drifting into war, his language must have been full of meaning, or it would not have been so frequently referred to as it has been. What I understand the noble Earl to have implied is that the vessel of the State, with no effective pilot at the helm, at the mercy of the winds, the waves, and currents it encountered, by starts and bounds was moving onwards to a point to which volition and design had never previously impelled it. Since 1851, we have observed in the action of successive Governments the same kind of movement towards the rule of the numerical majority, although corrected by the sense, and baffled by the fortune of the Empire. It is now time that a condition so full of uncertainty, of danger and of weakness, should exhaust itself. It is time that, if we cannot resolve upon a transfer in the seat of power, we should resolve against the method which is certain to precipitate it.

My Lords, that task appears to be a simple one; because one method only can precipitate the end I have referred to. No form of voting can precipitate it, since forms of voting do not change the body of electors. No measure on the county franchise can precipitate it, since the counties do not send the Parliamentary majority. The only scheme by which you can transfer power from the middle class to the numerical majority is the direct downward vertical extension of the £10 suffrage in all boroughs indiscriminately, without security or balance. By this method only can you reach a system which consigns the greater number of elections, and thus the greater number of elected, to the largest class in the community. But, on the other hand, no doubt the method is infallible. An intermediate basis of £5, £6, or £7 qualification can never have stability. Men who do not see this should hardly be allowed to touch the lowest wheel of our political machinery. The Democratic party have repeatedly declared in Parliament and out of it that household suffrage, in the sense in which Mr. Hume explained it, is their object. Their present Leader has renewed that declaration. They stand pledged by a series of conspicuous and now historical proceedings, which had their origin in 1848, to agitate in favour of it. The intermediate suffrage would enhance their power, and would not take away their motive to demand it. The best authorities—I mean such persons as Sismondi and De Tocqueville—have agreed that the lower franchise is less easy to defend against ulterior encroachment than the higher one. The line of reasoning which guides them I do not now repeat, because last Session I endeavoured to submit it to your Lordships. Causes which are general and abstract would therefore blend themselves with causes which are personal and local; the law which governs Democratic movement in the world, the facts which bind the Democratic party in our country, would unite to hurry on your intermediate limit to the household suffrage which it points to. Household suffrage, if we mean by it a law that all rated houses should give votes to their occupiers, is shown by the statistics the late Government presented to involve an unmeasured transfer of power from the electors to the non-electors in nearly all the boroughs of the kingdom. That I might not rely too much on the impressions derived from the blue book, I have recently confirmed them by the best statistical inquirers. Such must be the issue of direct and vertical extension in all boroughs, uniformly given, without any kind of compensation to protect the less extensive class against the larger one. And the question I shall now venture to submit to your Lordships is—Are we committed by some irrevocable circumstances to a policy so weak, so fatal, and disastrous, if you do not wish the State to be controlled by the numerical majority; so just, so deep, and so unerring, if that result is one the Empire pursues?

My Lords, in consequence of that policy having been frequently attempted, the impulse of the House would be, perhaps, to say that although it cannot be defended it cannot be escaped. To probe this vital question some reference to the past is unavoidable, and will therefore be, I trust, forgiven by your Lordships. These difficulties all arose in the Parliament which first met in November 1847, and sat till 1852. In that Parliament there was not a vote of any kind to sustain, to indicate, or to encourage a simple and direct extension of the £10 suffrage in all boroughs; and the result to which that system, as I have shown, leads, was year after year repelled by overpowering majorities. In the whole Parliament there were but two divisions in favour of any change in the Reform Act; a majority in favour of the ballot in 1848, a majority to read the first time a Bill on the extension of the county franchise in 1851. Both of these majorities were known to be accidents; both of them were reversed; both of them were inoperative as regards the points they favoured; but they contain the sum total of the lessons on Reform that Parliament administered, and they did not in any way suggest the policy in question. It first appeared in the Bill of 1852, and ten days afterwards the Parliament withdrew its confidence from those who had presented it. The Parliament which sat from 1852 to 1857 in no way departed from the judgment of its predecessor. The policy was urged again in 1854; and it would be almost ironical to say it met with no decided sanction or conspicuous encouragement, the Bill having been set aside by general remonstrance from all the parties in the State, and all the journals which are thought to influence opinion. No vote for any change in the Reform Act ever happened in that Parliament. The Parliament, which sat from 1857 to 1859, no doubt passed a Resolution on the second reading of the Bill, introduced by the noble Earl over the way and Mr. Disraeli, to the effect that the borough franchise ought to be extended further than that Bill proposed. But it was not pointed out in what mode it ought to be extended, or that in all boroughs the extension should be uniform. The Resolution was ambiguous; and we all know the real issue on which the Parliament pronounced was whether the Bill should be accepted or rejected. The Parliament which sat from 1859 to 1865 had very soon—in 1860—the opportunity to baffle and repel the policy I have referred to. The Bill of 1860, founded on it, was disposed of by a long series of Liberal attacks, and by the silence of Lord Palmerston. In 1865 the same judgment was pronounced by the same Parliament. In the Parliament which now exists, when the late proposal for a £7 limit in all boroughs was on the verge of being discussed, the project was swept away upon an issue raised by a near relative of the noble Marquess near me (the Marquess of Clanricarde). Up to this very moment the country stands unwedded to that policy. In 1852 it came from the Executive which it destroyed. Its importunity, indeed, has never been exhausted. It has marked and vitiated nearly every subsequent proposal. The fatal track has been adhered to. The wheels have never left the rut originally chosen. Reform has floundered where it fell. From the Bill of 1852 it passed, with variations of amount, to that of 1854, to that of 1860, to that of 1866. In the same way, my Lords, we hear from learned men that fabulous mistakes in history have been sometimes transmitted from the Middle Ages to our own, as each work became the stagnant copy of its predecessor. In spite of all its pertinacity the mistake in this transaction has not been endorsed by Parliament, or by the body of the Liberals. However lured by eloquence, however goaded by authority, however overawed by partizanship, of which we know the fascination and the terror, an instinct yet more powerful has guarded them against it. On every occasion they have seen further than the leaders who impelled them, and resolved to stand still before the danger in the path.

My Lords, by the indulgence of the House, three propositions may now, I trust, appear sufficiently established—That we are not as yet prepared for measures, after which the supremacy of numbers over Parliament must be considered unavoidable; that indiscriminate and vertical extension of the £10 limit in all boroughs is the single, clear, and open way to that result; and that on that way we have not entered yet, and are not forced to enter. Very little further is required to support the Resolution I shall have the honour of submitting to your Lordships. And no-

By their Addresses to the Crown both Houses have declared a readiness to consider legislation on Reform. A necessity for legislation on the subject is acknowledged. In 1859 it was proposed to increase the number of electors by a large variety of methods which involved nowhere any change in the £10 qualification. It was said that 500,000 voters might be so created. Justly or unjustly an incredulity exists upon that subject. Such a mode of acting would scarcely meet the exigency of the moment. We must in some way disturb the present limit in the boroughs. There are two practicable methods by which you may approach it beyond the method I have dwelt upon so long, and which the country has so frequently repudiated. You may extend it in all boroughs with plurality of voting to guard the old electors from a virtual disfranchisement, or you may extend it in some boroughs to a low degree, retaining it substantially inviolate in others.

My Lords, it is far from my intention to inveigh against plurality of voting. Great injustice has been done to it. It has been confounded with the system by which every elector would be permitted to heap all his votes upon one candidate so as to give a representative to the minority, and also with the system by which votes would be apportioned according to a sliding scale to income. Plurality of voting, I am bound to admit, involves no principle more startling than that, above a given limit, men shall have a greater voting power than beneath it. After some organic change, by which, in a single borough, 4,000 new electors had been added to 2,000 old ones, plurality which conferred two votes on all the old electors above the £10 limit would give them equal power with the new ones underneath it who must otherwise absorb, and not divide, the power of the borough. In point of fact, the principle exists already in our system—in a form more violent than that which I have just imagined. The principle is that of simple inequality, and it is now enforced by making householders above £10 electors—beneath that limit, non-electors in a borough. It would then be enforced by giving householders above a determined point a certain voting power, and householders beneath that point a lesser voting power. And in degree, the present inequality, so far from being extended, would be mitigated. The inequality of a positive and of a negative is greater than the inequality of a whole and of a fraction. The inequality of an elector and a non-electors is greater than the inequality of an elector with two votes in a class numerically weak, and an elector with one vote in a class numerically powerful.

But, my Lords, although I have endeavoured to uphold the system of plurality against the obloquy and misconception which surround it, I cannot be blind to the fact that they are nearly fatal to its prospect. At this moment it is clear, if it was not before, that a Commission should have been appointed in the autumn to familiarize the public with a method which might have put an end to many dangers which exist. It would be far too sanguine now to count upon that method. No one understands, and every one in consequence denounces it. We are thus forced on the alternative the Resolution points to. It is, that in certain boroughs you should have a suffrage which avowedly and openly—not by hidden germ and shuffling descent—gives the working classes an ascendancy in voting. The principle is not in want of explanation. It has been known for centuries amongst us. In Preston, up to 1832, we learn from the well-known work of Oldfield that the right of voting fell to all the body of inhabitants. 100 Members so returned would give the working classes advocates and organs, although it would not give them a majority in Parliament. By this method you might add with ease 1,000,000 of electors to the register, and yet not advance a step to the control of numbers over Government. It would not be an innovation either in our system under the Reform Act. Diversity of franchise is still its strong characteristic. In Universities men vote on one qualification; in counties on another; in boroughs on a third; and it would be ridiculous to hold that, by establishing a fourth in cities, which form a class alone, a novel principle would be insinuated.

My Lords, it would be too fatiguing to the House, and too exhausting to myself, to dwell on the collateral advantages to be obtained from such a measure. Able writers have explained them; but it is not swayed by thoughts like theirs that I have ventured to address you. We are in a grave political dilemma. The line of indiscriminate descent in all boroughs is exploded because we are not ready to confront the vital change which it eventually involves. The policy of 1859 (or lateral Reform) is insufficient for the moment. Plurality of voting is discredited. No course remains but to deliver boroughs from the iron uniformity which began in 1832, and which makes a large addition to the number of electors either fatal or impossible. If I am asked to name the practical advantage which the Resolution, if adopted, would secure, I do not hesitate to answer that without it the hope of such a salutary line would be materially lessened. The Resolution, if adopted by your Lordships, must be canvassed and explored in every society and every journal of the kingdom. It could not be evaded or forgotten by the mind of the community, and planted there might find its way into the statute book. Publicity is all you want to give effect to truth, and this—beyond the reach of individuals—your Lordships have the power of conferring. At the same time, if it would add to the difficulties of the Government in the present situation of affairs, I should not even wish it to be carried. It is well known that the Opposition are, in some degree, divided into sections, of which one is anxious to delay a crisis, the other ready to precipitate it. On public grounds belonging to the first, and day by day rejoicing in the strength which it acquires, I could not lend myself to any course by which Her Majesty's Advisers would be weakened in their attempt to grapple with the difficulties they have not created but inherited. Until, however, I have reason to suppose that it would add to their embarrassment, believing it would guide their course towards the safety of the Empire, I move the Resolution—

That in the Opinion of this House, in any further Scheme to amend the Reform Act of 1832 and increase the Body of Electors, it is not desirable or necessary that all Boroughs should return Members by the same Qualification.—(Lord Campbell.)

EARL GREY: My Lords, I cannot forbear from entreating my noble Friend not to ask the House to come to a vote upon the Resolution he has proposed. I am far from denying that the question it brings before us is one which, at a proper time, will be well deserving of our serious consideration; but it is only one of many questions which must arise with reference to Reform, and which will have to be considered when the whole subject is regularly brought before your Lordships, and, I submit, it would be extremely inconvenient on this occasion to select one only of these questions for the purpose of expressing an opinion upon it. This is what we are asked to do by the Motion before us, and I would therefore strongly urge upon my noble Friend not to press this Resolution upon the House. I cannot, however, offer this advice without at the same time expressing a hope that the great question of Reform will be brought before your Lordships at such a period of the Session and in such a manner as to give this House a proper opportunity of considering it. If the Bill is to be proceeded with—as I understand it is—immediately upon the adoption of the Resolutions which have been submitted to the other House of Parliament, and is only, after it has been considered in all its details, sent up to this House for your Lordships' concurrence, then I would submit that we should not have an opportunity of considering to any useful purpose the detailed provisions of the measure. I would therefore suggest a different course. I would beg to remind your Lordships that when, in 1833, the great and difficult question of the abolition of slavery was brought before Parliament by the noble Earl now at the head of the Government, who was at that time Secretary for the Colonies, that measure was submitted to the House of Commons in the form of Resolutions; those Resolutions became the heads of the intended Bill; they were discussed at great length in the other House of Parliament, and after being materially altered, were brought up to this House for your Lordships' concurrence. Your Lordships then discussed the Resolutions to which you agreed; they were returned to the other House of Parliament; and a Bill founded on them was brought in which ultimately became law. That course was found to be extremely convenient upon that occasion; and I would venture to express a hope that Her Majesty's Government will follow the precedent then set, and adopt a similar course with the Reform Resolutions. It seems to me that great advantage would attend the adoption of such a course. By adopting it after the Resolutions had been agreed to in the House of Commons, and before a Bill was introduced, your Lordships would have an opportunity of fully considering the principles upon which that Bill is to be framed before it is submitted to Parliament, or its provisions finally decided upon. The Resolutions which we learn from the Votes of the other House are now before them will, I trust, be modified in the course of the discussion, and be sent to us by the House of Commons in a form so clear and specific as to form the proper ground-work for a Bill, which can hardly be said of them at the present moment. Your Lordships would thus have an opportunity of discussing the principles of the measure at a time when the expression of your views might influence the ultimate decision on the Bill. On the other hand, it is quite clear that if we only receive the Bill very late in the Session, after all its details have been discussed and finally determined upon in the other House of Parliament, it will be very difficult for us to introduce any modifications, or express any opinions which would be likely to have their due weight in the House of Commons. It appears to me that this is a subject which may be very usefully discussed in this House, before the detailed provisions of the measure are settled and embodied in a Bill; and I would beg to point out that your Lordships seem to me to possess greater advantages in some respects for the due consideration of this important question than the other House; because we cannot conceal from ourselves that there are portions of any measure of Reform which must very materially affect the interests of individual Members of the other House, and the mere fact that they do affect their interests may seriously influence the decision to which the House of Commons may come. For instance, in considering the principle upon which re-distribution of seats shall be settled, it is impossible that many Members of the House of Commons should not be aware that the decision at which the House may arrive on this question will seriously affect their individual prospects of being returned to the reformed House of Commons, and their votes on that question may not unnaturally be somewhat biassed by that consideration. Now, your Lordships would be entirely free from that bias. In considering this question your Lordships could deal with it with greater freedom and greater impartiality than it could be dealt with in some cases by Members of the House of Commons; and therefore the prospects of the adoption of a measure suited to the wants of the country would be materially improved by having the principles upon which it is to be framed discussed in this House before the Bill is finally adopted by the House of Commons. If the contrary course is adopted the measure may come so late before your Lordships that however desirable it may be to settle the question during the present Session, it may be impossible for us to do so—because I hold that it is the bounden duty of this House not to pass a measure of such transcendent importance unless we can give it a deliberate examination, and that careful consideration which the subject undoubtedly requires. If it comes before us without any preliminary examination at the very end of the Session, it may be very difficult indeed for your Lordships to pass the Bill this year. But more than this—it appears to me that a preliminary examination of the principles of the Bill is calculated to diminish the danger of a difference of opinion between the two Houses of Parliament. It is quite possible that your Lordships may take a different view from the House of Commons on some points of the measure. If so, a preliminary discussion of the Resolutions would greatly tend to prevent a serious disagreement between the two Houses on such points of difference, and to make it easier to come to a common understanding, so that a satisfactory Bill might be carried in the present Session. A good many of your Lordships can, like myself, remember the great struggle for Reform in the years 1831 and 1832. It is therefore unnecessary for me to say anything in order to convince your Lordships of the very serious nature of the evils which arise from a disagreement between the two Houses of Parliament on a great constitutional question, and it certainly would be a great misfortune if such a disagreement were to take place on the subject of Reform. I believe that the danger of this would be much diminished, if not entirely avoided, by the adoption of the course I propose; and that it would tend to prevent any disagreement between your Lordships' House and the House of Commons if your Lordships were to have a proper opportunity of discussing this all-important question. On this ground I consider it to be of great importance that the Resolutions should be sent to us from the other House before a Bill is introduced. I have taken this opportunity of throwing out the suggestion; but, at the same time, I have no desire to press the noble Earl at the head of the Government for an immediate answer. All I want is that the noble Earl and the Government should consider seriously what I have now said, and unless they have strong reasons for adopting a different course, I hope such Members of Her Majesty's Government as sit in the other House will ask that House to communicate the Resolutions to which they may agree to your Lordships, and invite your Lordships to concur in them before a Bill is introduced. I will only add one word more. It seems to me that much of the advantage which is to be derived from the mode of proceeding by Resolution instead of by Bill would be lost if the Resolutions are not to come before the House before the Bill is framed; for if it is to be framed and discussed in the Commons before it comes before your Lordships, I am totally at a loss to see what useful purpose the Resolutions will answer, at least so far as your Lordships' House is concerned. On the other hand, if we can first discuss the Resolutions, I cannot but think that the probability of passing a sound measure of Reform will be greatly increased.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, it is not necessary for me, in the few words I have to say, to trespass long upon your Lordships' attention. It is very satisfactory to me, as it must be to the other Members of Her Majesty's Government, to see noble Lords in this House anticipating an early opportunity of discussing the provisions of the Reform Bill which is to be introduced into the other House of Parliament. It is also satisfactory to find that there is not that objection felt upon the part of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) and other noble Lords to the mode of proceeding by preliminary Resolution, which has been so strongly expressed elsewhere. But, my Lords, the noble Baron who introduced this question must forgive me if I decline to enter into it and to follow him in the historical review of the steps which have been taken, and into an argument upon the principles of the proposed Bill. I must decline to discuss in any degree the character of the provisions of a Bill which is not yet submitted to the Legislature, or the basis of Resolutions which have not yet been discussed by the other House. My Lords, whatever advantages there may be in proceeding by Resolution, I do not think that any advantage could be derived from selecting a single portion of what may or may not be in the Bill, and passing an abstract Resolution upon the subject of that particular point. Moreover, my Lords, the noble Lord's Resolution, I must say, is one that does not appear to me very much to advance the solution of the question; because it is to the effect that it is not expedient in any future arrangement of the franchise that the suffrage in all boroughs should be based upon the same qualification. This does not at all help us forward. The noble Lord only advances the simple abstract proposition—he does not tell us on what principle he would introduce a variety in the suffrage, or on what ground we should be justified in giving the inhabitants of one town a precise qualification which was to be withheld from the inhabitants of another, nor does he tell us why he would withhold the right of voting from any one town. I perfectly agree with the noble Lord that a mistake was made in 1832 by the abolition of a number of various franchises which had existed previous to that time. Many of them had become objectionable on some grounds, but as they had grown up during a length of time, and in the course of a vast number of years, they had the advantage of introducing various qualifications in different places, and enabling different boroughs to be represented by Members who were returned by different classes of electors. But that is a very different thing from attempting, after you had adopted the dead level of a uniform franchise in all boroughs, to introduce into them various descriptions of franchise—which have no authority to recommend them, and for the adoption of which in one borough no reason applies which does not also apply in the case of another borough. However, my Lords, without discussing the provisions of a Bill which is not yet introduced, I may perhaps be permitted to say that I do not at all agree with the noble Lord in his description of the Bill which he says it is intended to introduce. He describes it as a measure for the transfer of political power from the middle classes to a numerical majority—by which I suppose he means the most numerous class of society. Now, I do not think that that can be taken as the meaning of the portion of Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne which spoke of the extension of the suffrage without unduly disturbing the balance of political power. The noble Lord tells me that there are only one or two modes of extending the suffrage, and one of those modes is lowering it; which he says would have the effect of completely transferring political power to the numerical majority. I am not going to enter into the question of plurality of voting, or any of the other questions which the noble Lord has thought fit to describe as belonging to the measure; all I wish to say is, that the character given to the Bill which the noble Lord imagines we are about to introduce is very different from the character of the paragraph in the Queen's Speech, and necessarily from that of any measure which it is intended, in accordance with that paragraph, to introduce and pass through Parliament. I trust that the noble Baron will see that it is impossible for me upon the present occasion to discuss any portion of the very large and difficult measure which is about to be submitted in its integrity to Parliament, and that your Lordships will see that no advantage can be gained by your Lordships adopting a Resolution upon a point which may or may not come on for consideration hereafter. With regard to the observations of the noble Earl (Earl Grey), to whom I always listen with that respect that they invariably deserve, the noble Earl was kind enough to say that he did not expect from me upon the present occasion any precise or positive answer to the question. The noble Earl very courteously sent me notice this morning that he intended to make the suggestion he has just made; but I have not yet had an opportunity of consulting other Members of the Cabinet upon the point, and I should be sorry to give any opinion upon it offhand. I am, however, quite of opinion that it is a question which deserves the serious consideration of the Government. I can assure him that my only object, or at all events my chief desire in dealing with this question is that the Bill should pass through the two Houses as rapidly as possible, and that as much time as possible should be given to your Lordships' House to discuss its principles. I shall be willing to adopt any course that will be most likely to expedite the passing of the measure, but my only doubt is whether the course suggested by the noble Earl might not lead to considerable delay. If the Resolutions, after passing the House of Commons, are to be submitted to your Lordships' House, and a full discussion is to take place upon them in order to ascertain how far we agree with the House of Commons upon the principle of those Resolutions, it appears to me that all that time the Bill will be hung up, and wholly withdrawn from the consideration of Parliament. I do not wish to express any precise opinion upon the suggestion made by the noble Earl at the present moment—it is one that deserves to be considered; but my object is to accelerate as much as possible the safe settlement of a most important question:—and as far as opinions have as yet been indicated, it has not met with any opposition of a character threatening to interfere with the consideration of the measure, and as far as the proceedings of the other House have hitherto gone we have no sign that any factious opposition will be resorted to. My Lords, it will be a most happy circumstance indeed if the two sides of the House, feeling the necessity for mutual agreement and confidence in reference to this question, meet in a spirit of calm and deliberate discussion, resolved to bring about an early and satisfactory settlement of this most important matter in which the happiness and prosperity of the country is concerned.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, this question is, I think, not only very important, but very difficult; and it will be but right in this and the other House of Parliament to allow the Government to use their own discretion in respect to the mode in which the question should be proceeded with. It is true, however, that there are objections to dealing with the question by Resolutions; though it must also be admitted that such a method of procedure has its advantages; and the same may be said of the suggestion of the noble Earl. The discussion by your Lordships of the Resolutions come to by the other House might lead to a complete canvassing of the main principles of the measure before it assumed the shape of a Bill; but, on the other hand, it would lead to considerable delay, and, for my part, I am quite willing that the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) should consider the matter and take that course which to him seems most likely to bring about the result he aims at. With regard to the Motion before your Lordships, I must say the noble Earl made a very valid objection to it when he said it was vague and indefinite. I quite agree with him, and I think it is fatal to the Resolution; but I have seen certain other Resolutions to which I think the same objection will apply.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I said it was a negative Resolution, and did not advance the matter.

EARL RUSSELL: You said the noble Lord was ready to affirm something and did not know what that something was; that seems to me to be an elaboration of the description "indefinite." I trust, however, that next week, before the noble Earl has made up his mind on the suggestion of my noble Friend (Earl Grey), we shall know what is actually to be proposed to Parliament upon the subject; for at present, whether it be from my own want of sagacity or no, I am absolutely at a loss to know what the Resolutions on Reform, which are well known to the public, mean. I am indifferent as to the method of procedure, or the nature of the propositions; but I do want some definite propositions upon which this and the other House can say "Aye" or "No" with a clear understanding of the question decided on.

EARL GREY said, that what he desired was to have a preliminary discussion on the proposals of the Government in the same way as was done with the Slavery Abolition Bill; and he could not but think time would be saved if the Resolutions were discussed by their Lordships before they assumed the shape of a Bill. The preliminary discussion in 1833 enabled the Bill to pass with very little trouble.

LORD REDESDALE said, the form of procedure suggested by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) concerned the other House as a question of privilege. He doubted whether the House of Commons should be asked to forward their Resolutions to their Lordships for discussion before the Bill was framed. It should, in his opinion, be left to the other House to take its own course in the matter, and if the suggestion were made at all it should be made not by a Member of the Government but by a private Member.

EARL GREY said, he was surprised, considering that the question was one which affected the interests and the welfare of Englishmen of all classes, and one which might possibly change the governing authority of this great nation, to hear the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down give utterance to a doctrine which he certainly had thought would not have found expression in their Lordships' assembly.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if the question were a Railway Bill, or other matter of detail, the question of time might be a consideration; but when the measure was one of the greatest importance to the country—in fact, one essential to the Constitution and likely to settle that Constitution for a great number of years—he was sure their Lordships would think it entitled to the fullest discussion, no matter at what period of the Session it might be introduced.

LORD REDESDALE desired, in answer to the noble Earl (Earl Grey), to remark that though the question was one, as the noble Earl had justly said, affecting the interests and welfare of the nation at large, it was one which also materially affected the constitution of the House of Commons. It would not, he thought, be right for their Lordships to initiate a measure by which the constitution of the other House would be affected, or to proceed to a discussion of such a measure without an express invitation from the assembly so greatly concerned.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that as the noble Earl the First Minister had expressed an unwillingness to adopt the Resolution, after his former statement he should not feel at liberty to press it. The noble Earl was perfectly mistaken in supposing that he (Lord Campbell) had in any way denounced his coming measure as a transfer of power to the numerical majority. He had not indulged in any speculation, much less description, with regard to it; but had only ventured to remark that, before any kind of practical suggestion on Reform could be given to the country, the question—Were we ready to accelerate that transfer—ought to be encountered. So far from complaining of the reserve the noble Earl had exercised, he wished that reserve had been extended further, and that the noble Earl had not in any manner compromised his freedom with regard to the principle the Resolution had embodied. A noble Earl (Earl Grey) had thought fit to disparage the Resolution as a negative one. It might be negative in the form of words which happened to be used, but it was quite affirmative in character. It affirmed the intelligible policy of introducing into boroughs more than one qualification. That policy alone could meet the problem of the day; and either House of Parliament, in his opinion, was justified in urging it upon Her Majesty's Advisers.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, February 21, 1867.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Right hon. Michael Morris, for Galway Town.

PUBLIC BILLS.—Resolutions in Committee—London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance.

Ordered—Church Rates Regulation*; London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance*; Lyon King of Arms (Scotland)*.

First Reading—Church Rates Regulation* [42]; London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance* [43]; Lyon King of Arms (Scotland)* [44].

Second Reading—Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance [35]; Metropolitan Poor [9]; Shipping Local Dues* [5]; Land Tax Commissioners' Names* [31]; Sugar Duties* [37]; Duty on Dogs [36]; Railway Debenture Holders [20].

Referred to Select Committee—Railway Debenture Holders [20].

IRELAND—EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. LANYON said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If the Commissioners of National Education (Ireland) lately adopted a Resolution to the effect that in future no member of the Board would be allowed to enter his reasons of protest against any Motion adopted by a majority of the Commissioners; and, if so, will he have any objection to produce a Copy of the Resolution in Question?

LORD NAAS said, the best answer he could give to the Question of the hon. Member was to give the contents of a letter he had received from the Secretary of the Education Board in Ireland, who said there was no resolution now on the minutes of the Board to the effect that in future no member should be allowed to enter his reasons of protest against any motion adopted by the majority, and that the practice was not to record on the minutes the reasons assigned by any member for assenting to or dissenting from any motion adopted by the majority.

SCOTCH BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What Scotch Bills are to be introduced by Government, and who is to take charge of the Scotch business in the House of Commons, the Lord Advocate not having a seat?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the Hypothec Amendment Bill and the Recovery of Debts in Sheriff Courts Bill have been already introduced and read a first time in the House of Lords. To-night the hon. Member for Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery) will introduce a Bill for the Regulation of the Court and Office of the Lyon King at Arms. Several other Bills are in an advanced state of preparation—namely, the Writs Registration Bill, the Judiciary Court Bill, the Heritable Securities Succession Bill, and the Consolidation of Law of Nuisance, &c., in Scotland Bill. Inasmuch as the now Lord Advocate will probably be promoted to the Bench in a few days, I cannot state until I have consulted the new Lord Advocate, the present Solicitor General, as to the time at which they will be introduced.

MR. BAXTER: In the meantime, who is to be responsible for Scotch business?

MR. WALPOLE: I will answer that Question another day.

QUARANTINE IN THE WEST INDIES.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN SPEIRS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What are the regulations in the British West Indian possessions as to quarantine, stating its duration in each colony, whether performed in vessels or on shore; if in vessels, their average tonnage and whether provided at the expense of the Government, or of those subjected to quarantine; if on shore, whether in reach of medical attendance, and whether such attendance is provided at the expense of the Government, or of those undergoing quarantine?

MR. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, it was impossible to state what the regulations in the British West India possessions were as to quarantine. Looking through the Acts on the subject, he found that one of them made specific regulations, but they left it to each Governor to make such regulations as the circumstances of a case might call for. There was no specific regulation as to whether quarantine was performed on shore or in vessels. As to medical attendance, he believed it was charged to the masters of ships, but was not certain. If the hon. Gentleman had in view any particular case, and would move for a Return of the regulations affecting it, he would obtain them by sending to the colony for them.

WEST INDIES—MORTALITY IN THE HARBOUR OF ST. THOMAS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN SPEIRS said, he would now beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will lay upon the table of the House, Returns of the Mortality on board all British Vessels in the Harbour of St. Thomas's from yellow fever, dysentery, and cholera from the 1st day of July till the 31st day of December, 1866, as well as on board the Intra Colonial Mail Steamers having intercourse with that port; whether the British Consul at St. Thomas's and the Mail Agents had reported the appalling number of deaths, and what steps the Government had taken in consequence?

MR. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, that St. Thomas was not an English colony, and his Department had no information whatever on the subject of this question. He had, however, made inquiries in other Departments whether there were any Returns made by the British Consul at St. Thomas. The Board of Trade had received a report of the number of deaths of seamen in that island and on the voyage home, but that was imperfect, as it did not include passengers. If the hon. and gallant Member thought fit to move for that Return there would be no objection to its production. As to the destination of vessels going to that harbour, over that harbour they had no control; but with reference to the mail packet ships, they called there under a contract which would shortly expire, and on its termination arrangements would if possible be made to prevent their calling at that unhealthy place.

IRELAND—WATERFORD ELECTION.

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, taking into consideration the alleged conduct of sixteen men of the 12th Lancers, who, on the polling day of the late Election for Waterford, according to the sworn testimony of the officer in command, broke away from his control, and without orders charged along the Quay of Dungarvan, the result being that two persons were killed, one of whom, while standing near the door of his house, was stabbed by one of the soldiers with a lance, as appears by the reported evidence of the coroner's jury—taking this into consideration, Whether he coincides in the opinion expressed by Colonel Sawyer in his Report to the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, that the conduct of the troops at the late Waterford Election was admirable, and that if casualties among the people, however much to be regretted, did occur, they were unavoidable; and whether he considers it necessary there should be a searching investigation into the breach of military discipline resulting in so lamentable a catastrophe?

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, I can have no hesitation in saying that if the sixteen men of the 12th Lancers had broken away from the control of their commanding officer, and had charged along the quay of Dungarvan, I should not concur with the opinion that they behaved admirably, but I should consider that further inquiry was necessary. I think I stated before that Colonel Sawyer's official Report was borne out by those of all the officers who commanded detachments on that occasion; and I will read an extract from the official Report of the officer who commanded the detachment alluded to.

MR. BAGWELL: What is the name of the officer?

GENERAL PEEL: The hon. Member has had the good taste not to insert the name in the Question, and I trust he will allow me to adhere to the course he has adopted. The officer says—

"On crossing the bridge, just before reaching the Court House, the magistrate requested me to bring some men, and clear the corner of the bridge and a portion of the quay. I was in the act of doing so when a mob inside some iron railings hurled some tremendous big stones at the men, and the people on the quay did the same. At this period the conduct of the rioters, a great body of whom had rushed into the shipping, was so violent that my men were, in some cases, obliged, in self-defence, to offer resistance, and if any casualties have occurred among the mob they were (while much to be regretted) entirely unavoidable, considering the circumstances of the case and the active attack made directly upon the troops. I must add that a cross-fire of stones and other missiles was hurled at the troops as they advanced along the quays. It is the firm opinion of myself and the officers under my command that the proceedings of the rioters were the result of a preconcerted organization."

As to the evidence given at the inquest, application was made to the officer to know how he reconciled his Report with that evidence, and in his answer he says—

"Permit me to observe that I adhere to the official Report. I regret extremely that at the inquest, owing to the cross-examination being so entirely different from what I had expected, the exceedingly puzzling way in which questions were put, and my being always stopped when I was about to explain, I became confused, my presence of mind failed me, and I gave irrelevant answers. For instance, when asked 'Did not your troops break away from your control?' I said, 'They did on that occasion,' whereas, 'on that occasion' I was not with them, having left them on the quay to perform the duty the magistrates had ordered through me."

The noble Lord commanding the troops in Ireland, Lord Strathnairn, is the best judge as to whether that answer is satisfactory, or if any further military inquiry is necessary. There is another view of the question which it was for the civil authorities to take into consideration.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he wished to say, in explanation, that he thought himself justified in putting the Question, because the officer in command of the 12th Lancers swore that the troops did break away from him on the occasion.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

MR. FORDYCE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in awarding compensation to the owners of cattle killed before the passing of the Cattle Plague Act, it is the intention of Government to include in such compensation counties which defrayed such expenses at the time from local funds?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that some nights ago he stated, in answer to a Question put to him, that any compensation to be made by the Government would be reduced by the amount received by the owner out of public rates or from any other source. It followed, therefore, that in any county where compensation had been made to the full amount no further sum would be given, because the object was not to compensate for county, but for individual losses.

MR. FORDYCE: Would that apply if the funds were the result of public subscription?

MR. CORRY: It did not matter what source the compensation came from, the amount would be deducted from that given by the Government.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the certificate referred to in sec. 19 of "The Courts of Justice Concentration Act, 1865," has been received by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and what is the probable cost of the land and buildings respectively as stated in the certificate?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that a certificate, dated July, 1865, had been sent to the Treasury. It did not state in terms that the amount which the Commissioners had certified would be sufficient, but it used these words—

"We certify that the land to be taken will be sufficient for all the purposes of the Courts, and that the probable cost of the land and buildings will not exceed the amount of the funds provided by the Courts of Justice Buildings Act of 1865."

It would be in the recollection of the House that £1,500,000 was the amount provided by the Act.

ARMY—ARTILLERY—STUD SHOT.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY BAILLIE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House the Report of the Commanding Officer of Artillery at Halifax in respect to the Ordnance Select Committee's stud shot sent to that Colony; and also, whether he will lay upon the table the Report of the Ordnance Select Committee upon the same?

GENERAL PEEL: I have no objection whatever to lay the papers on the table.

SCOTLAND—EDUCATION.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Commission on Education in Scotland have given in their Report to the Government, and when it will be laid before this House?

MR. CORRY, in reply, said, the Report had not yet been received, nor had he any means of knowing when it was likely to be received. The Report would not be sent to the Committee of Council on Education, but to the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

GRANTS TO MISSIONARIES.

QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When a Return, ordered by the House of Commons on the 7th of June last,

"Of the names of the several Missionaries who participate in the grant this Session of £2,013 made by Parliament to 'Missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel,' the amount paid to each Missionary, where each is stationed, and how long each has received a grant from Parliament," will be laid upon the table of the House?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that he would lay the Returns on the table in a few days.

LANCASTER ELECTION COMMISSION REPORT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Commission appointed to investigate the proceedings at the late Lancaster Election, which has been already circulated, will be presented to the House? He begged to add that extracts from the Report were at present having a very wide circulation, and were causing a good deal of uneasiness.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, that Report, as well as the Reports on Reigate, Yarmouth, and Totnes Elections were directed to be laid on the table this very day, and I believe they were. When laid upon the table the officers of the House will see that they are printed and circulated among the Members, and the matter is out of my hands, as far as I have power over it. As to the circulation of the Lancaster Election Report, I have no notion how it was done. Certainly it has not been from any command given by the Home Office. It is very much to be regretted that portions of the Report should so have got into circulation.

(Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD NAAS: Mr. Speaker—When at the commencement of this Session Her Majesty, in her gracious Speech from the Throne, announced to Her Parliament that the Government would be enabled to dispense with the exceptional powers granted last year, no Member of the Government, nor, I believe, any one possessed of information with regard to the state of Ireland, had any expectation that it would be necessary at so early a period to ask Parliament to renew, even for a limited time, those exceptional powers. This might, in the opinion of some, indicate that the Government were not in possession of that information which they ought to have had. But, in truth, it is the peculiar nature of this movement, and the extraordinary characteristic of this conspiracy, that it is beyond anything difficult to obtain the information which is usual when such designs are intended. I do not believe that that circumstance evinces any particular skill or ability on the part of those engaged in these treasonable designs, but it arises simply from the fact that the leaders and principal organizers of the conspiracy are not in Ireland, but carry on their plots in a foreign land. As far as we can discover, all they have been lately doing is issuing orders to their sympathizers and agents in the United Kingdom. It is very well known to this House that the leaders have been anywhere but in Ireland. Sometimes they have been in this country, at other times in France, but the general seat of their designs has been the United States. Therefore, it has been impossible to obtain that amount of information with regard to their designs which would have been attainable had they carried on this conspiracy within the United Kingdom. Experience has shown that when active operations have been planned in this country, they speedily become known to the authorities, and there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining ample notice of the fact. If, Sir, it was with reluctance last year that I undertook the disagreeable duty of moving for the continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, that reluctance has not been decreased by the administration of the powers conferred on the Government by that Act. No man who really appreciates the advantages of the free Constitution under which we live can without feelings of dislike, and even loathing, exercise those exceptional powers which circumstances have rendered necessary. No man can take part in a proceeding which consigns an individual to gaol, without the prospect of a speedy trial, without feeling that he is doing an act which nothing but the absolute and imperative necessity of the case could justify. That has been my feeling and the feeling of the Lord Lieutenant, and of my learned colleagues who have been engaged in the performance of this most disagreeable and irksome duty. I think it is due to the House and the Government that I should state as briefly as possible the course of events with regard to this conspiracy since I had the honour of addressing the House last year. When the present Government came into office there were, I think, about 330 prisoners detained under the authority of the Lord Lieutenant's warrant. On the 1st of September that number was reduced to 286, and so satisfied were we of the general appearances that presented themselves of the decline of the conspiracy and of the partial abandonment by the conspirators of their designs, that we were enabled by the 24th of November through the release of persons, many of whom were, in humble condition, to reduce the number in confinement to seventy-three. This fact, together with the small number of warrants issued, will show how indisposed we were to exercise the powers with which we were invested except in cases where absolute necessity existed for it. In September one warrant was issued, in October one, in November five. Sir, about the end of November a considerable amount of activity began to be displayed among those persons both in England and in Ireland who were known to be members of the Fenian Brotherhood. The usual stories were promulgated with wonderful industry throughout the country to the effect that an immediate rising was about to take place. These stories were found to be circulated everywhere; circulated not by Fenian agents only, but by persons whose ordinary business led them to travel about the country. It was evident that these stories came from one and the same source, for whether it was in Cork or in Donegal it was always precisely the same alarming rumour which was detailed. Moreover, discoveries of concealed arms were made, and in one case a seizure was made on board an English steamer arriving at Cork of as many as eighty rifles with their usual accompaniments, a considerable quantity of ammunition being also found, with a fictitious address. The usual symptoms of activity likewise presented themselves in collecting money, the well-known collecting card used by Fenian agents being found in almost all the northern towns in England and in many towns in Ireland. Raffles were also held, and all the wonted exertions for the collection of money were put into active operation. It was reported that those leaders of the conspiracy who had openly declared their intention of levying war in Ireland had left America, and this report considerably increased the alarm. The result was that a state of alarm, almost amounting to panic, prevailed from one end of the country to the other, and the most unfortunate consequences followed. Numbers of people, believing these stories, left their homes, there was a run upon many of the banks, and the Government were inundated with demands for protection from every part of Ireland. Nor was this alarm altogether unfounded, because the circumstances I have mentioned were the same as those which occurred in February, 1866, which justified the then Government in applying to Parliament for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Sir, the Government did not think it necessary to add any very extensive or serious precautions to those already existing. A slight increase was made in the military force in Ireland, but that increase only brought up the numbers of men actually serving in Ireland to the same number as they were in March and April of last year. A slight addition was made to the naval force stationed on the coast, and a few detachments were placed in different small towns where information had led us to believe that the greatest danger existed. The latter measure had the most salutary effect, for it has always been observed that whenever a small military force is placed in Ireland, alarm disappears, and the loyal and well-disposed among the population take heart and feel renewed confidence. A remarkable occurrence took place in a certain small town in the South of Ireland which it is not necessary to name. During the 24th, 25th, and 26th of November, as large a sum as £5,000, entirely in gold, was drawn out of the Bank. Early information reached the Government, which led us to believe that it was advisable to station a small force there, and as soon as an announcement was made that some soldiers were likely to arrive the next day, the run upon the bank ceased, and confidence was restored. About that time very important information came into the possession of the Government, which induced us to make some arrests in Dublin and in the country, and that step was attended with the best results. The number of arrests was not, however, very considerable. In December ninety-seven warrants issued, in January seventeen. During the present month there have been nine, making in all, with the seven issued in September, October, and November, 130 warrants issued by the present Government since they assumed office. The policy which the Government have endeavoured, and, I believe successfully, to carry out is this—we have taken as much care as we could to arrest those persons only who we had reason to believe were leaders, or were taking a prominent part in the conspiracy. We did not think it necessary to make the indiscriminate arrests which were thought necessary, and, perhaps, were necessary, in the earlier stages of the conspiracy. We endeavoured to select a few of the leaders, and consign them to prison, and we found that the effect produced was quite sufficient, the immediate result being, that wherever arrests were made the conspiracy seemed at once to come to an end. A most gratifying feature presented itself in connection with this matter during the months of November and December, for a spirit was evoked such, indeed, as had been evoked on many occasions before, which led all classes and all parts of the population to testify their utter repudiation of the designs of these persons. We received loyal addresses and resolutions passed by meetings held in various parts of the country, and composed of men of every class and creed. There was hardly a man of any influence in the districts where danger was supposed to exist who did not at once record his desire to give every support in his power to the Government, and who did not repudiate, in the strongest terms, any sympathy with the conspirators in their designs. Sir, the Government received these assurances thankfully, answering them in almost every instance. The answer was this—that if the Government saw any necessity for appealing to the active support of the loyal population of the country of all classes and creeds in their endeavours to maintain the public peace, they would not have the slightest hesitation in doing so. At the same time, it was pointed out that the law is express upon this subject, and it is that no measure of the kind, such as swearing in special constables, shall be taken unless it is proved by satisfactory evidence that the ordinary powers placed at the disposal of the Government are insufficient to cope with the danger. I am happy to say that in no part of Ireland did any circumstance arise which could justify the Government in informing the magistrates that such an emergency existed. Had such necessity arisen, we should have had banded on the side of the law and order every man in the country whose opinion or whose influence was worth having. Sir, the consequence of all this was that towards the close of the year those unmistakable signs of disquietude to which I have referred had to a great extent disappeared. The subscriptions which had been pouring in in considerable numbers in December, gradually became scanty, and, as far as we could judge, the whole thing by the middle of January was at a very low ebb. The non-appearance of the leaders, who had made protestations in America that they were going to create a rebellion in Ireland during 1866, induced considerable doubts in the minds of their supporters whether they intended to appear at all. I assure the House I never made an announcement with greater pleasure than I did when, before the meeting of Parliament, I told my Colleagues, with the full concurrence of every Member of the Irish Government, that we saw no reason why the extraordinary powers granted by Parliament should not be at once dispensed with, and why we might not rely for the preservation of the public peace on the ordinary powers of the law. Sir, soon after Parliament met there took place at Chester that mysterious and unaccountable occurrence. Whether it was the effect, or whether it was a mere coincidence, is difficult to say, but immediately the announcement of that movement got abroad, the old signs of disquietude re-appeared, and every sign of activity on the part of well-known members of the Fenian Brotherhood was again manifested. An unusual number of strangers appeared, activity was displayed among those known to be connected with Fenianism, and alarm was at once apparent. Then, Sir, followed that extraordinary occurrence in a remote part of the South of Ireland. It is not necessary for me to describe to the House the details of what happened in the neighbourhood of Cahirciveen and Killarney, because they are already in full possession of them, and nothing that I could say would add to the extreme preciseness and accuracy of that information. A sudden outbreak took place, which was evidently got up and led by persons not known in the country, who succeeded in persuading a small number of deluded individuals to appear in arms for as long, I think, as upwards of three days, against the authority of the Queen. Sir, the first thing shown by these occurrences, is the ease with which measures may successfully be taken by the Government for the repression of such disturbances. The second is that the most ample information is at the disposal of the Government, and that they are warned in sufficient time to allow them to take the fullest precautions for the preservation of the peace. The third is, that the loyal spirit of the population has displayed itself, and that there have been no signs of sympathy with the Fenian movement on the part of the great mass of the agricultural population of Kerry. To show with what ease troops may be transported from one part of the country to the other, and how hopeless of success these movements are, I may mention that the information of the late outrage did not reach Dublin until six or seven o'clock in the evening, at a time when most of the official gentlemen had gone home. Notwithstanding this, Sir Alfred Horsford received intelligence of what had occurred at eight in the evening, and by eight o'clock next morning he was 110 miles off with a small army of 1,000 men, ready to march anywhere. In the course of the day he received orders to go to Killarney, and arrived there the same day with ample means to suppress any attempt at insurrection. With regard to the information received by the Government two hours before anything occurred at Cahirciveen, the constabulary received information of the intended attack on the police barracks, and in ample time to put them on their guard. Before the insurgents arrived the authorities were ready to receive them, and to afford protection to the loyal and well-disposed. At Killarney the magistrates received information which enabled them to arrest the man who intended to be the leader of the movement. In Killorglin, again, the police were warned of the intentions of the rebels, so that every movement has been notified in time to the authorities, so as to allow precautions to be taken and salutary measures to be adopted. I wish now to refer to the spirit of the agricultural population of the county. The insurgents, by threats and persuasions, endeavoured to induce the agricultural population to join them, but they signally failed in every instance. No sympathy was expressed in the movement, and although a certain amount of terror was, no doubt, caused by these armed bodies of men, they did not succeed, except in one or two instances of extreme compulsion, in getting food from the population of the district. A great deal has been said of the supposed sympathy of the agricultural population of the South of Ireland. Now, I do not wish to overstate the case; but it is my duty to say that, so far as my experience extends, I have not, since I have been in office, seen any evidence of that sympathy with the rebels, on the part of the population, which some people say so widely exists. I do not deny that a great deal of discontent exists in Ireland; but I do not believe that there is sympathy with the authors of these insurrectionary movements, among the rural population. There are some curious facts on this subject which I should like the House to consider. At the end of November, when, as I told the House, the movement was almost at an end, I had some statistics prepared of the occupations of those who had been connected with the Fenian conspiracy, and who had been imprisoned since the Habeas Corpus Act was first suspended. It shows that the men engaged in this movement have been confined very much to one class of the population. The total number of persons arrested up to the end of November, 1866, was 752. Of these, 314 were tradesmen, artisans, and millworkers. Many of these might be shopkeepers, but as they were entered merely as "tailor" and "shoemaker," they were classified among the tradesmen. There were fifty-two shopkeepers, twenty-five publicans, forty-five clerks and commercial assistants, and thirty shop assistants and shopkeepers' sons. There were only thirty-five farmers, and twenty farmers' sons (three of whom were students). The remainder consisted of national schoolmasters, persons who had been in the American army, labourers, &c. [An hon. MEMBER: How many national schoolmasters?] Not less than twenty-nine, and I am sorry for it. But of the 752 arrested up to November, under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant, only thirty-five were persons in the occupation of land. That is sufficient to show the House the particular class of persons who are engaged in this conspiracy, and the House will learn with satisfaction that the most important and numerous class of persons of these districts, who are in possession of almost all the wealth and industry of the country, have abstained from taking part in this movement. I should not perform my duty if I did not state here, in regard to recent events in the South and West of Ireland, how much the country is indebted to the exertions of the Roman Catholic clergy. Every one knows how great their influence is over their people, and I have great satisfaction in stating that I believe there is not a Roman Catholic clergyman who has not, either directly or indirectly, exercised the whole of his influence to prevent the people from taking a part in this conspiracy. Witness the occurrence at Rosbeg. The Rev. Mr. Maginn met a body of armed men in the middle of the night on their road to the police barracks, and addressed them. That was not a duty of a very agreeable nature. We know that those Irish-American colonels and generals are not men who have much respect for the sacred calling. But the idea of danger did not present itself to the mind of the rev. gentleman. He addressed them at considerable length. They were unknown to him, because they came from another parish, but he warned them of their danger, and implored them to desist from the attack upon the police barracks, which they meditated. In consequence of this appeal the men, to the number of sixty or seventy, desisted, and crossed the mountains in a different direction. There are many occasions in which the Roman Catholic clergy have addressed their flocks in the most impressive manner, and the House has probably seen some of these addresses in the newspapers. A Member of the Government would fail in his duty if he did not acknowledge the great obligations which this country is under to these clergymen for their assistance in preserving the peace of the country. Last week there were ninety-seven persons in custody under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant. I think every one must admit that after what has occurred in Ireland during the last week or ten days it would be impossible for the Government to avoid asking for the extraordinary powers which Parliament gave under similar circumstances on the previous occasion. It is well known that large numbers of persons have arrived from America ostensibly to take part in the movement. These persons, if this Act be continued, will find that success will be impossible and their imprisonment speedy. I have, on the other hand, a strong conviction that if the House should deprive the Government of this power of sudden imprisonment, we should be deprived of the only power of dealing effectually with this particular class of men. To show, however, that the Government do not demand these powers for a longer time than is necessary, and in order to give Parliament the opportunity of deciding for what space the continuance of these powers is necessary—above all, in order to show the mass of the loyal and well-disposed people of Ireland that we trust in them—we do not propose that this Act should be continued for a longer period than three months. That will give Parliament, during the present Session, an opportunity of again deciding on what course should be taken should the Government deem it necessary to ask for a further renewal of these powers. Sir, if these deluded men continue their operations, if they still remain in this country, if they go about spreading false and mischievous stories among the people, announcing their intention to make war upon the Queen, then Her Majesty's Government will not shrink from applying to Parliament for another prolongation of this Act. But, Sir, I would fain trust that the events of the last week may be sufficient to show these persons how hopeless are their designs; also that the willingness of Parliament to grant us a continuance of these powers may show them that this country is not to be trifled with. We have endeavoured, on every possible occasion, to have recourse to the ordinary course of the law. Accordingly, at the late Commission in Dublin the Government placed on their trial a number of persons for their participation in this conspiracy. The consequence is that thirteen or fourteen of them were convicted and are now under sentence, some of them having pleaded guilty. One of the most important convictions that have taken place was that of the man named Meany, who was indicted under the Treason Felony Act, for that, being a British subject, he was connected with, and had been engaged in, treasonable practices in a foreign country. The evidence against him was clear; and, under a clause of that Act, which was framed for this particular purpose, he was convicted of a treasonable offence. That ought to be sufficient to show that British subjects cannot go to France or America and engage in treasonable practices or conspire to levy war against the Queen of this country, without being responsible, if they come back, to the ordinary law of the realm—that they commit an offence against the law of England, and are liable to be most severely punished. I think, Sir, I have said enough to convince the House that an absolute necessity exists for renewing these powers for a limited time; and I ask for their renewal not only in the name of the Government but in the name of the large majority of the people of Ireland, who are desirous that it should be granted. I will read to the House a resolution, passed yesterday at a meeting of the magistrates of the county of Kerry, which was forwarded to me by telegraph. An hon. Member of this House, the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert), was in the chair, and it was proposed by Mr. James O'Connell, and seconded by Mr. D. C. Coltsman, and unanimously resolved—

“That in the opinion of this meeting the safety of life and property imperatively requires the renewal of the Act for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and that the Government ought immediately to be apprised of this our opinion. Resolved,—That our chairman be requested to forward the foregoing resolutions to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, with an urgent request that no effort be omitted to ensure the renewal of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act.”

That meeting consisted both of Protestants and Roman Catholics, of gentlemen belonging to almost every shade of political party; and the resolution was moved by a near relative of Daniel O'Connell. That will show how completely unanimous is the opinion of the loyal population in Ireland that this House ought to continue these powers to the Government. We have received similar expressions of opinion from all parts of that country. Great alarm has been excited; and the general impression in people's minds in Ireland is that the renewal of this Act is the only mode by which the Executive can be armed to meet the peculiar danger with which the country is menaced. My Colleagues and I have been placed now for a considerable time face to face with this conspiracy; and I may say that the longer I live, and the more I see of it, the more am I convinced how mean and despicable a thing it is, and how sordid are the motives of the men engaged in it. The collection of money is the principal object they have in view. In 1848 some men of high character and respectability—men of great talent, and I may almost say genius—were engaged in a treasonable movement, which yet only resulted in the wretched Ballingarry affair. But everything of that kind is absent in this case. These men keep almost entirely in the dark. The leaders are hardly ever seen. The reputed leader has ever since the 28th of October been in hiding. Even in the midst of the large population in the United States which is known to sympathize with this movement he has not dared to show his face. That is the movement against which this House is now called upon to legislate. That is the sort of men who placethemselves beyond the ordinary powers of the law, and to deal with whom extraordinary powers are required. It has been called a military movement; but its military exploits have been confined to three cowardly and atrocious crimes committed in connection with it. An unhappy man, suspected of being an informer, was murdered on the bank of a canal near Dublin; one policeman lost his life, and another was wounded in the back while endeavouring to perform his duty carrying despatches in the county of Kerry. Yet many of these men, whose exploits are of that character, call themselves colonels, captains, and lieutenants of the Fenian army, and have been parading in full uniform the streets of New York announcing themselves as about to undertake the conquest of Ireland, and calling themselves "the regenerators of their country." But it would be well that they should know that what is burlesque in New York may be tragedy in Dublin, in Limerick, or in Galway. We might commiserate the poor illiterate men who have been seduced into joining this movement by representations that they are serving the interests of their country. No doubt punishment would have to be awarded according to law to these miserable dupes, but still to some extent they deserve pity. But, Sir, there can be no pity due to men like those evil-disposed strangers who return to vex and disturb their native land; and if they attempt to carry out the purposes they have formed in America they will find a swift and sudden destruction overtake them. They are but lawless "filibusters," and the punishment they will be called upon to undergo will be that which every civilized nation visits upon such heinous offenders. They inflict the direst injury on their country. By them the peace of Ireland has been endangered, trade and commerce checked, industry stopped, and capital scared away. Before I sit down, I should like to read to the House a short extract from a remarkable address delivered last Sunday by the Roman Catholic Bishop Moriarty to a large assemblage of his flock at Killarney. I am sorry to say that even in that congregation there were sympathizers with this movement, and that a number of young men left the church while the Bishop was speaking. The Bishop said—

"One word about the prime movers of all this mischief. If we must condemn the foolish youths who have joined in this conspiracy, how much must we not execrate the conduct of those designing villains who have been entrapping innocent youth and organizing this work of crime? Thank God! they are not our people, or, if they ever were, they have lost the Irish character in the cities of America; but, beyond them, there are criminals of a deeper guilt—the men who, while they send their dupes into danger, are fattening on the spoil in Paris and New York. Tho execrable swindlers, who care not to endanger the necks of the men who trust them, who care not how many are murdered by the rebel or hanged by the strong arm of the law, provided they can get a supply of dollars either for their pleasures or for their wants! Oh, God's heaviest curse, His withering, blasting, blighting curse is on them!"

Sir, I cannot add a single word to this. I believe that the right rev. gentleman was amply justified in every expression that fell from him; and it is, Sir, in order to enable Her Majesty's Government to get rid of these pests and drive them from the country that I now ask the House to continue to us these exceptional powers.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Naas.)

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I fully shared the satisfaction which I am sure was felt by every Member of this House at the announcement made in the Speech from the Throne that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the time had come when the exceptional legislation required for the security of life and property in Ireland might cease, and when the ordinary course of law might be safely restored in that country. It is therefore with deep regret that I find that the expectation thus held out to the House cannot be fulfilled. But I do not hesitate to say that, independently of the statement of the noble Lord, the facts which have lately taken place, and the occurrences which are notorious, justify the noble Lord in now coming forward to ask that Parliament should not deprive the Government of those powers which can alone enable them to deal with a conspiracy with which we are all, unfortunately, now too familiar. I think the Government would have failed in their duty if, on account of an opinion they had expressed before these recent occurrences, they had abstained from now asking at the hands of Parliament those powers which are essential for the maintenance of the security of life and property in Ireland; I must express my deep regret—which I am sure every Member of this House shares—that there are persons, whether in or out of Ireland, who, after the experience of the last twelve months, are still wicked or insane enough to keep up a treasonable movement which, while utterly hopeless in its success, is inflicting, as the noble Lord said, the greatest evil on Ireland; and which, small as are the numbers engaged in it, not only creates a feeling of insecurity and alarm, but must impede every measure for the real improvement of that country. Good may, however, arise out of evil, and I hope that in this instance the feeling which has been generally manifested in Ireland, irrespective of class or creed, in opposition to these wicked and treasonable designs, will tend to lessen the bitterness of that political and religious animosity which has too frequently exhibited itself in that country; will lead men of different parties and denominations there to act more together for the common advantage of their native land, and will induce Parliament to legislate for Ireland in a spirit of impartiality and conciliation, and with an earnest desire to remove every just cause of complaint—if just cause of complaint there be—by taking those means which may best conduce to her true and permanent prosperity. The noble Lord has paid a well-merited tribute to the conduct of the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy in Ireland, for it is impossible not to see that their influence has been strenuously exerted in doing that which, as loyal men and lovers of their country, they were bound to do, with a view to preventing the spread of this conspiracy. Looking to the arrests which have been recently made, I think everybody will admit that it is essential for the general security that those persons should not be allowed, by their immediate liberation, to prosecute their treasonable designs; and I was glad to observe that, in the short discussion yesterday on the introduction of this Bill, three Irish Members—all entertaining Liberal opinions—sharing in the feeling of regret, and I may say of humiliation, to which the necessity of this measure is calculated to give rise, yet admitted that necessity, and concurred in the course taken by the Government. The noble Lord, in my opinion, does well in limiting the operation of the Bill to a period of three months; and I am sure we shall all rejoice if within that time the conviction shall force itself on the mind of these agitators that they have not the slightest chance of achieving even transient success, and if the noble Lord shall be able to announce to us, on the responsibility of the Government, that there is no further necessity for the continuance of this measure.

MR. BAGWELL said, that though he should not oppose the passing of the Bill, he had to complain that many persons who were committed to Mountjoy Prison under the provisions of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act were placed in solitary confinement, and were treated, though not found guilty of any crime, as if they were convicted criminals. Unless he received a promise that those prisoners should be treated differently in future, he should move a clause in Committee on the Bill, with a view to remedy a state of things to which he strongly objected. He hoped they would receive from the Government an assurance that whenever it was found necessary to put the provisions of the Act into force it would be done with the utmost tenderness and caution. It was the foreign element that made this movement dangerous, and as a protection against the persons coming from America it was necessary to put the Act in force.

MR. BLAKE did not mean to oppose the measure if the Government considered it necessary for the suppression of the insurrectionary movement, as it was a mercy to those embarked in the hopeless attempt. He believed, however, that the law as it stood was sufficient for the purpose. There were numbers then in prison who would have been released in a few days only for the movement in Kerry. As they had not participated in it, he hoped Government would take a favourable view of their case, and release such as it would be safe to do so without imposing on them the heavy security which he was aware had been in some instances availed of by Government magistrates to throw petty obstacles in the way of the liberation of prisoners when the order for release came.

Sir George Grey

With the suppression of the movement in Kerry he believed for the present there would be an end of active rebellion in Ireland; but let not the House be deceived into thinking that as much disaffection did not prevail as ever. They might be sure it did, and only awaited a favourable opportunity to show itself. He could fully corroborate what the late Lord Lieutenant had said after he left office, "that the peasantry of the south and south-west of Ireland would join the movement if they thought it likely to succeed." They, as well as the great mass of the people of Ireland, despaired of their grievances as regarded the land question being redressed by constitutional means, and regarded a resort to arms as the only method by which they could right themselves; and they did not adopt that last resort only because they well knew that under present circumstances there was no use in contesting with the whole military power of England at a time when that country was at peace with other nations. But if she became engaged in a war with some powerful State, when the arm of Ireland would be most wanting to aid her, the chances were Ireland would be a sharp thorn in her side. The reckless folly the Fenians exhibited in their conspiracy in Ireland, their invasion of Canada, their meditated attack on Chester Castle, and the raid in Kerry—all went to prove that, if a good chance for rebellion offered, numbers might be expected to flock round the standard of any leader who presented himself in whom they had confidence. At that moment there were at the convict works of Portland, or in other places of penal servitude, fully fifty representative men of the Fenians, many of them soldiers and non-commissioned officers, who had served with distinction in the British army. How many thousands were there behind these men who sympathized with the movement? Stephens had been lauded as a very wonderful man on account of his organization and the numbers he had induced to join him. No doubt he was an able man; but the country offered such ready-made materials for rebellion that any zealous active man taking the trouble would get any amount of persons to undertake to join a rising that promised success. The noble Lord read a list of those arrested to show there were few farmers in the movement. But did it not occur to him that if the artisans, schoolmasters, and others he spoke of, did not feel certain that the peasantry would join them if things looked promising that they would ever have entered into the enterprise. They knew right well that the farmers had great grievances to complain of, and would hail any change as one for the better. The noble Lord was rather inconsistent in his assertions about the state of feeling in Kerry. He said the Fenians met with no sympathy there, and gave credit to the Bishop and clergy for being the great cause of the coldness shown to the adventurers. The next moment he had to admit that some of the congregation walked out of the chapel when the rev. prelate denounced Fenianism; and he would like to ask the Chief Secretary if the insurgents received no assistance from the peasantry, how it was, with a military force of probably some thousands hemming them in, and having no food with them, that the horse, foot, and artillery had not captured a single Fenian invader? The correspondent of The Standard, who, he believed, was an eye-witness of most of what he described, said that nearly all the male portion of the congregation quitted the chapel during the Bishop's exhortation. Now, if that did not look like sympathy, he was puzzled to know what it looked like. The noble Lord and others said that Fenianism was entirely of foreign growth, and had taken but little root in Ireland. If it had not, why were they making so much work about it?—and as to being of foreign growth, he might as well say that the Italian, Polish, Greek, and Hungarian revolutions were of foreign growth, because the people who fomented them met and conspired in London. The Italian and Greek revolutions were not a bit more of foreign growth, because the Italians and Greeks who took a leading part in them found it more convenient and safe to mature their plans in France and England. In the same way the Irish Americans, who wanted to revolutionize Ireland, concocted their plans at New York or Washington, but were ready to form a junction in Ireland with their countrymen at the right time. The Irishman who arrived in America had, if possible, stronger feelings against England than those he left behind. In proof of this he might mention that a person near Clonmel sent a friend some time since to O'Mahony, who was then treasurer to the Fenians, for a debt of twenty pounds he owed him. O'Mahony paid him in English half-crowns and shillings, which he had received from the immigrants just landed, whose first act on arriving in America was to contribute to the fund for carrying on the war against England. Whilst there was so much to complain of, the House might feel sure that, whether at home or abroad, the Irish peasant regarded England with hostility, as the cause of his own and his country's misfortunes. Coercive Acts like the one about being passed might quench the flame of rebellion, but the embers remained, ready to burst out anew, and undoubtedly they would unless Ireland was legislated for in a generous and statesmanlike spirit. He, as well as others, had appealed to the late Administration, when they suspended the Habeas Corpus Act last Session, to introduce some measure which would tend to remove the causes of disaffection. They had responded to that appeal by bringing in a Land Bill which, if passed with some modification, would, he believed, whilst serving the landlord, have brought contentment and prosperity to the tenant, and, in a few years, have made Ireland as loyal as England or Scotland. Unfortunately, the Government were defeated before they could carry their good intentions into effect. When he heard the allusion to the land question from the Throne, he hoped the result would have been a measure of nearly equal value to the one introduced by the late Government. Had it been so, he would have felt it his duty to his country to support the Administration of the Earl of Derby, as he placed that vital question, involving, as it did, the very life of the people, and their existence on their native soil, before every other consideration. But he was grieved to say that the measure, as shadowed forth in the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland a few nights ago, would not be worth the paper on which it was printed to the great mass of the tenant farmers. The present Administration had a glorious opportunity of raising Ireland from her depressed position. Let them, of course, suppress the revolt, such as it was; but if they had to strike with the mailed hand, why not, when the sad necessity ceased, raise up the prostrate form, and render Ireland a prosperous and contented sister of England? A grave responsibility before God and man would be incurred by the Ministry if they suffered, without an honest effort to prevent it, the fairest portion of the Empire to continue poverty stricken, discontented, and disaffected.

Mr. Blake

MAJOR KNOX said, he regretted to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for Clonmel calling upon the Government to treat these ruffians in a better way than prisoners for debt were treated in Ireland, and he trusted that the application would not be granted. His object, however, in rising was to call attention to the statement of his right hon. Friend, to the fact that he depended much upon the Roman Catholic clergy and Bishops. No doubt that was so; but it was only fair to say that the loyal men in the North of Ireland were ready and willing to support the Government under any circumstance. For his own part, he regretted that it was not proposed to extend the suspension of the Habeas Corpus for a year instead of three months, because all right-minded men in Ireland regarded it as a protection, and not as an interference with their liberties. He had heard that when the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) went to Ireland, he attended a meeting—he would not say of what—at which he proposed that the Government should buy up some of the estates and re-sell them on easy terms among the tenant farmers. He understood, however, that a number of people at the meeting objected to that proposal on the ground that they would rather get the estates for nothing. He would suggest to the hon. Gentleman that it would be as well if he ceased to go roaming about Ireland, raising hopes which certainly could never be fulfilled, and which were not for the benefit of that country.

MR. BRIGHT: I had no intention of saying a word in this discussion, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken—and he is, I presume, a Member from Ireland—that I shall say nothing to him as to any opinion he may entertain about me or about what I have said or done. I rise for the purpose of expressing my astonishment that there should be any Member in this House who defends the course which has been condemned by my hon. Friend the Member for Clonmel (Mr. Blake), who defends the practice of arresting men under the Act now in force merely on suspicion, and merely as a precautionary measure, at a time when suspicion is very common, and when evidence is often very little to be depended on; and that men so arrested should be treated with, if not the harshness, I may say the severity which is often, and, indeed, commonly shown to criminals who are convicted. It appears to me that Parliament could never have intended that such treatment should be shown to persons arrested under this Act. They are not punished, and the Act does not intend that they should be punished. They have not been tried. It is not the custom in England, and it is not to be defended under the English Constitution, that men who have never been tried, and therefore cannot have been convicted or sentenced, should suffer the severity which seems to recommend itself to the feelings and the sense of justice of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. I am not surprised that a Member who could say that should complain of the noble Lord that he only recommended the House to pass this Bill for three months. If there be one thing more than another which has given satisfaction to-night on this sad occasion, it is that the noble Lord was able to say he thought it was better that the Act should remain in force for three months only, and that he hoped at the end of that time he should be able to assure the House that the Act was no longer necessary. The hon. Gentleman opposite comes from the country which has suffered all these misfortunes, and which during the lifetime, I suppose, of the oldest Member of this House has been periodically before the House in the position in which we find it to-night, complaining always—rightly or wrongly, but complaining always of the injustice of this House, and objecting always to the coercive measures of this House. I hoped that there had not been on that island, or from that island, any man who could have stood up before the Imperial Parliament of this country, and expressed—I was about to say, and if I were out of the House I would say—such atrocious sentiments.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he regretted that a measure of this kind should have been again called for. On a former occasion he seconded the Resolutions of the hon. Member for Cork, the object of which was rather to call the attention of the House to the necessity of listening to the oft-repeated applications for justice from that country, than to throw any obstacle in the way of the Government. Soon after the present Government came into office they spoke of sympathetic measures, but no step in the right direction had been taken. He gave the noble Lord credit for certain changes of opinion, and for the manner in which he proposed to work out these changes in regard to the land question, but considered the measure which had been introduced nothing more than a delusion. He was glad to hear the manner in which the services of the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy had been acknowledged, and hoped the noble Lord in return for those services would recommend his Colleagues to cancel the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, which prevented them from taking the position to which they were entitled. If the Government would relieve the Catholic clergy in Ireland from the disabilities under which they laboured, if they would deal with the Irish Church, and look to the question of education in Ireland, then, indeed, they would be doing something towards relieving themselves from the degrading and humiliating necessity of asking again for a suspension of the Constitution of the country. If the noble Lord and his Colleagues carried out the promises they had made, and the remarks delivered by the Lord Lieutenant at the recent banquet of the Lord Mayor of Dublin, they would do the State a lasting service, and achieve for themselves the well-earned gratitude of a loyal people.

MR. KENNEDY said, he regretted the continued renewal of the Act, the necessity for which arose from the unjust arrangement between the owners and occupiers of the soil. He believed the root of all the evils of Ireland to be centred in the land question and in the state of the Irish church, which was an insult to the whole of the Roman Catholic population.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

METROPOLITAN POOR BILL—[Bill 9.]
(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Earle.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. G. Hardy.)

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that speaking on behalf of a large constituency which would be affected by its provisions, he fully justified the President of the Poor Law Board in dealing with the question. Referring to The Lancet Commissioner's Reports, he earnestly wished to see increased cubical space provided in workhouse infirmaries. In coming to the consideration of any changes in the administration of the Poor Law in the metropolitan district, the House had to deal with a very strong impression on the public mind that some sweeping reform was required; whilst, on the other hand, they must remember that the parochial mind was very sensitive on the subject of local self-government. He gave credit to the right hon. Gentleman for the impartial Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the subject, and was fully convinced that the state of the workhouses required immediate attention, and that some additional buildings were requisite. He thought some further information was desirable as to the distinction between the cases of lunatics to be removed to county and separate asylums. The separate asylums had been recommended by the Lunacy Commissioners in 1859; but he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would inform him how he proposed to distinguish between those cases which were now sent to the county asylums and those for which he proposed to provide separate asylums. With regard to cases of fever and small pox, there were only two institutions in the metropolis where these cases were treated. It was now proposed to establish two institutions on the north and two on the south side of the Thames; but he was afraid that the extraordinary prices demanded for land around London would considerably increase the difficulties of carrying out the measure. With respect to the provision of separate asylums for various classes of the sick poor, he believed the Bill carried out the recommendations of the Commissioners of 1834. With regard to the removal of children from the workhouses to district schools, the District School Act of 1844 proposed that they should be so removed, and there was no part of any scheme for the improvement of workhouses more useful than that. He gathered from the Bill itself that the managers would be nominated by the existing Boards of Guardians, together with certain gentlemen who should be appointed by the Poor Law Board. He approved of the provision that the drugs and medicines should be provided by the districts. At present there were only five unions in the metropolis which provided expensive medicines at their own cost, and it was unreasonable to expect that the surgeons receiving small salaries should themselves provide those drugs and medicines. He now approached the financial part of the question. He was well aware of the extraordinary difficulties which hampered the subject, and of the pressure which had been put on the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) for the equalization of the poor rates throughout the metropolis. He would not give full expression to his own views upon this important subject—it might be imprudent just now; but he would say that in going as far as the right hon. Gentleman had done, he had not gone one bit further than public opinion was ready to support him; and if at a future time he saw his way to further progress in the same direction, he would find that waste, bad management, and want of responsibility would vanish, and with them the bugbear of centralization. If the whole metropolis was obliged to pay for the expense of lunatics, fever and small pox patients, children's schools, fees for birth and death registration, vaccination, and other such matters, more than half the battle was already fought. So far as the right hon. Gentleman proposed to go, he gave him his most cordial and hearty support. He also approved of the arrangement by which the money was to be paid from the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund. A few years ago the Metropolitan Board of Works objected to be receivers of the fund raised for the support of the casual poor, and perhaps the plan contemplated by this Bill was the better. There was one portion of the Bill, however, which might meet with some opposition—namely, the repeal of the local Acts, which were, he believed, ten in number. Now, there must be something radically wrong in a system under which, year after year, unseemly contests arose between the Poor Law Board and the parishes under local Acts, which refused to recognise the authority of the Central Board, and were perhaps unable to carry into effect those improvements which the Central Board and public opinion pressed upon them. He was afraid that some opposition would be made to that part of the Bill which dealt with the parishes under those local Acts, but he would give it his support. In conclusion, he earnestly trusted that a measure of this paramount importance would be pressed forward, not with undue haste, but with all possible despatch. The question was too important to brook delay. Other triumphs might be won in this House, but the triumph of the right hon. Gentleman, if he carried this Bill, over poverty, disease, misery, and affliction would be one well worthy of the previous reputation he had won; and so far as his humble support was concerned, he promised

MR. LOCKE said, that the metropolis was much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) for introducing this Bill, and so far as it went he (Mr. Locke) would give it his most earnest support. There was one point, however, where the right hon. Gentleman might have gone a little farther, and that was with regard to building the extra asylums in certain portions of the metropolis called districts. It would very frequently, and must indeed generally happen, that those districts would be composed either of rich parishes or of extremely poor ones. If they were composed of rich parishes it was quite obvious that they would be very well able to erect them at their own expense, and feel it no great burden. But let them take another district—the one, for instance, in which he was principally interested on the other side of the water. He presumed that Lambeth and Southwark, or portions of those two boroughs, would be united together to form a district, which would be called upon to erect these new buildings at its own expense. He thought, and the opinion was entertained by the guardians and authorities in the poorer localities, that the expense of erecting these buildings should be borne by the common fund. The Bill, however, provided that the cost should be borne by the parishes forming the district, although it went on to say that after the asylums were built certain expenses might be borne by the common fund. The Bill further provided, by the 67th clause, that the expense of treating for small pox and fever in the hospitals should be borne by the common fund. He thought that provision should extend to all forms of disease, and he did not see why any distinction should be made between persons suffering from fever or small pox, and persons suffering from any other diseases. The same remark applied to the medicines; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to take those points into his consideration. Objection had been taken to the proposal as to the introduction of guardians not elected by the ratepayers. He had received a deputation on that subject, and some gentlemen of great experience assured him that it would not be possible in many parishes to select persons, whether magistrates or otherwise, rated to the amount of £100. It was therefore suggested that a £50 rating would be sufficiently high. With regard to magistrates, they were at present ex officio guardians, and it was suggested that where there might not be a sufficient number in the parish there might in the district, and that the district might be made available for their selection. As had been well stated by the noble Lord, public opinion was favourable to a larger measure than the present, and he hoped the common fund would not be so restricted in its operation as was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. Taken as a whole, he approved of the Bill; but he was sure that if the measure were extended it would meet with the approval of the metropolis generally.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he had no desire to oppose the Bill, but he wished to point out one or two imperfections contained in it. He saw that the City of London Union would have to pay £27,000 to the common fund, which was nearly 4d. in the pound, and the City of London had a right to complain that while it had lately re-assessed its property to a very high amount, there were twenty-four parishes in the metropolis which had not been re-assessed for several years, and that, of course, involved a much larger payment from those unions and parishes which had been re-assessed very lately. In those twenty-four parishes the total rating amounted to £9,134,800, which represented three-fifths of the whole rating of the metropolis, which amounted to £14,730,200. The whole metropolis should be fairly assessed, so that every part should bear its own fair proportion. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) on having framed a measure which would mitigate the pressure which now rested on the poorer districts, but predicted that the principle of a more equal apportionment of the poor rates would have to be carried further. Statistics showed that only 14 per cent of the pauperism of the country attached to the land, and that 36 per cent was traceable to domestic servants. It was in the West End where this class were most largely employed, yet the burden of their support, when they were obliged to resort to parochial relief, mainly fell on the poorer districts. When the new Poor Law passed, it was with the idea of crushing out poverty and pauperism throughout the country. It was found, however, that with increase of prosperity and all the appliances that administered to the comfort and luxury of a people, there must always be poor, and he hoped that by the relaxations indicated in this measure, that class would be better cared for than they had hitherto been. The separation of the sick, who were only temporarily in the workhouse, from the other inmates, would be a great benefit to the masses of the poor of the metropolis.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman who had brought this measure forward, although there were several objections to the measure itself. It destroyed in a great measure the principle of local self-government, and it might have the effect of inducing a great amount of carelessness on the part of those who had hitherto been careful in looking after the poor. There was also this danger to be apprehended in increasing the taxation, that the poorer ratepayers who were only just able now to keep their heads above water, and, by great exertion, to pay their rates, might be brought down to the level of paupers themselves. He believed it was the fact that there were a great number of ratepayers at this moment who were wholly unable to pay their rates. In the borough which he represented there was necessarily a considerable amount of pauperism, and though many of the residents were, no doubt, in affluent circumstances, there were many ratepayers who, if the rates were increased, though only to a slight extent, would be reduced to the condition of paupers. The Bill provided in one of its sections for the reception of the sick and infirm and other classes of the poor into the asylum. It struck him that that provision was exceedingly elastic, and that there was no reason why any of the poor, even the able-bodied, should not come in under the designation of "other classes." As to the gentlemen to be appointed to act with the guardians, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) that the proposal for nominee guardians was objectionable, and that the qualification might be reduced to £50 with greater likelihood of finding persons able and willing to undertake the duties of guardian. As a rule, the persons who were most likely to take an interest in the administration of the Poor Law did not live in houses rated at £100 a year. What he feared was, that if the Poor Law Board added one-third to the number of the guardians one of two things might happen: either that parties might be selected who would not attend at all; or, if they did so, they would create, by reason of their being nominees of the Poor Law Board, so much jealousy as against themselves, that they might be induced to act as a compact body, and they would then rule things very much as they liked, and the guardians, who were elected by the ratepayers, would take very little trouble upon themselves. He feared that the expense of the measure would be considerable. He had to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his courtesy to a deputation which waited upon him yesterday, and trusted that their representations would have his best attention.

MR. GILPIN said, that the House seemed so nearly agreed as to the merits of the Bill, that it would seem a work of supererogation to continue the discussion for any length of time. At the same time, having had the honour of being concerned with the Poor Law Board for some four or five years, it appeared to him the right hon. Gentleman opposite had done a great work in a very good manner. The Bill was one that was very much required. Were he disposed to enter into the details—which he was not, as the present did not appear to him to be the proper time to do so—he would allude for one moment to the multiplicity of Boards, and suggest whether there might not be a greater simplicity of management. If the Boards were not quite so numerous—if, in fact, they were more of a Central Board—he would say that the Bill itself was, in the main, an admirable Bill. He did not take entirely the views of one or two hon. Gentlemen who had preceded him in the discussion upon even some of the details, and he could only assure the right hon. Gentleman opposite that, as far as his influence went, he should have great pleasure in working with him the Bill through Committee, and doing all he could to support it.

COLONEL HOGG said, that the parish with which he was connected—St. George's, Hanover Square—was one of the parishes under local Acts, but the local authorities did not intend to offer the slightest opposition to the Bill. The Board of that parish had, he thought, done their duty very well, but they could not expect exceptional legislation in their favour. The parish had set the example of adding to their burdens, having raised their assessment because it was not so high as it ought to be. He suggested that, under the existing system, sick casual poor were thrown on parish rates, who ought to be brought on to the common fund. He thought that his right hon. Friend had decided on a very just medium, and he should give a hearty support to the measure. He feared, however, from the large number of offices and buildings required, that the administration expenses would be larger than his right hon. Friend supposed.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would include all the sick and insane poor in the common fund. Pauperism only should be dealt with by local rates. As to fever cases, it would be well to remember that they were better treated separately in huts, isolated from hospitals and infirmaries, than where large numbers were congregated together. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House that 850 cubic feet of space was necessary for each individual. If so, he imagined there would be only room for 14,000 instead of 20,000 in these London workhouses. One Board for the uniform management of the sick poor in London, just as the general drainage, &c., of London was placed under the Metropolitan Board of Works, would be preferable to the numerous local Boards provided by the Bill. That was the only plan for introducing economy and good management. He must unite in congratulating the right hon. Gentleman in undertaking a very difficult and important subject, and he trusted that in Committee they would make the Bill work satisfactorily.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the singular clearness and candour of the speech with which he had introduced the Bill, and he was glad to find that the Poor Law Board was so well represented on both sides of the House. He was, however, unable to give the measure his entire approval. He entirely approved of the proposal to separate from the mass of paupers those who were suffering from fever or small pox, or imbecility or insanity; but he could not give his support to that portion of the Bill which would subvert the whole of the present mode of conducting the Poor Law system in the metropolis. From the right hon. Gentleman's speech on introducing the Bill the inference might have been drawn that no such measure was required. The Commission of 1864 did not Report in favour of such a measure, but sanctioned the course followed during the last thirty years for the management of these affairs. Although the public mind had been naturally excited by the circumstances which had lately occurred in four of these London unions, yet the right hon. Gentleman thought it highly creditable that only four cases could be cited which had called down, and very properly so, the public indignation. If a very few isolated cases of that kind in thirty years were to justify them in condemning the present system as administered by the local Boards of Guardians, as good grounds could easily be discovered for condemning the Central Board itself. For example, had not the Central Board reprimanded the guardians at Croydon for appointing nurses to attend the sick? He had never heard any argument adduced in favour of the proposal for empowering the Poor Law Board to nominate guardians of the poor who were to sit in conjunction with the elected guardians. The Bill would take the management of the poor out of the hands of the guardians for the purpose of intrusting it to a Central Board; but that, to say the least, would be a mere experiment, and many persons well acquainted with the subject doubted very much whether that experiment would prove successful. Those people believed that the introduction of nominated guardians would not work satisfactorily, and that either those gentlemen would not attend, and then their appointment would be nugatory, or else they would only come when there was some special work to be performed; such, for instance, as the disposal of some piece of patronage, and then their presence would create irritation and jealousy. Moreover, if Boards of Guardians were to be put so entirely under the Central Board, they would become only ministerial officers without any discretion, and then they would not give their time and attention to the business. He had no personal experience of these matters, and was altogether at the mercy of those from whom he derived his information; but these persons said that no sufficient case had been made out against the guardians, and they complained of the unjust censure cast upon them. They objected also to the election of guardians being taken out of the hands of the vestries, and thought the Poor Law Board would be disappointed by the results of that change. Though approving the earlier part of the Bill, he was of opinion that the rest required very careful consideration in Committee.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that on the whole he approved of the Bill, but he thought that it might be improved in many of its details. He doubted whether the inhabitants of the poorer districts would be able to construct asylums at their own expense, as was proposed in the 5th and the 6th clauses. He had, in the first instance, approved of the principle of the Bill; but some of the objections urged by those who were practically acquainted with the management of the poor were so strong as to strike him with great force. It was a laborious, anxious, and often thankless task which those men undertook in giving up so much of their time and taking so much trouble respecting the management of the poor. As a rule, they did not occupy the best houses in the world, and the clause requiring nominated guardians to occupy houses of £100 a year would exclude the most valuable of this class of men, whom it certainly ought to be their object to encourage. No end of Boards for schools, hospitals, and so forth, were to be created, so that the administration of the poor would be far from being simplified. By Clause 17 it was proposed that twenty years should be allowed for the repayment of any loans that might be raised; but, in his opinion, it would be desirable to allow twenty-five or thirty years for that purpose. On the whole, he thought this Bill would pass easily through the House, and he had called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to one or two matters of detail which would render it more acceptable to the public.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, that being connected by property with a part of London, where the pressure of the rates was heaviest, he wished to state that he approved generally of the Bill, but there were one or two points to which he wished to call attention. It was provided that one of the Commissioners of Lunacy should attend at the meetings of the Board for the management of pauper lunatics. He thought it would be of great advantage if the constitution of the Board of Lunacy itself were altered. Any business that required to be transacted with regard to pauper lunatics should be attended by some one more connected with that House than was the case at present. They all knew the expense that had been inflicted on counties in the matter of pauper lunatic asylums by the Lunacy Commissioners, while if anything went wrong a long and angry discussion ensued, which went through various Departments till it reached the Home Office, where, he must say, it generally received a courteous and amicable settlement. There had been a meeting lately of no fewer than twenty chairmen of quarter sessions, and they were all of opinion that it would be a great improvement if the management of pauper lunatics were more immediately connected with some Board represented in that House.

Mr. HIBBERT said, though he was not a metropolitan Member, he wished to make a remark or two on the Bill now before the House. He objected to, and protested against, the Poor Law Board being allowed to nominate members to act on the Boards of Guardians. If that were once admitted it would become a precedent for the same thing being done in the country. And wherever it was supposed that a guardian Board failed in its duty, the Poor Law Board would step in and claim the power to nominate members. He thought that was unnecessary, and if the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied with the present composition of Boards of Guardians it would be better to raise the qualification, so as to get a higher class of men to undertake the duty, or to allow the Poor Law Board to send a paid officer of their own to attend the different Boards of Guardians in the same way in which it was proposed that the Lunacy Commissioners should be represented. This, he thought, would be of further advantage as tending to introduce unity of action. He also objected to the salaries of the different parish officers being thrown into the common fund. The best course, he thought, to adopt was to establish a Central Board by which all those charges might be brought within one settled rule. If the amount in each case was left to be fixed by a Board of Guardians, the result would be that we should have one Board attempting to raise it to the sum which happened to be paid by another.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS: Sir, I rise to express my concurrence in the sentiments which have fallen from those hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in favour generally of this measure. I coincide entirely in their view as to its purpose and principle. It is a Bill, which, if I understand it properly, is meant to provide for the better treatment of the sick poor in the infirmaries of the metropolitan workhouses—an object greatly to be desired, inasmuch as it seems to be proved that the present system has failed in this respect. I look upon the principle on which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) proposes to proceed in that direction as a sound one, as being in conformity with the principle of the Poor Law Act itself, and of that more recent legislation by which the area of charge was extended, and the burden of maintaining the poor distributed over a larger district than the mere locality supposed to be peculiarly liable. The principle of extending the area of charge touches, in my opinion, as the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) stated the other night, the root of mismanagement, whether in town or country. By extending the area of charge you weaken the motive for that kind of local parsimony which is very frequently mistaken economy, and is attended with great mischief to the poor. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the view he has taken as to the mode in which the condition of the sick poor in the metropolis is to be improved, as well as upon the fact that after the experience of a few months he sees the wisdom of asking fresh powers from the Legislature not relying upon the imperfect authority under which he acts, or engaging in unseemly contests with Boards of Guardians. I felt sure that with his ability he would at once perceive the difference between the technical interpretation of the law from which his powers are derived, and its practical application under existing circumstances. I think, moreover, that the right hon. Gentleman is quite right in losing no time in coming to this House for the additional powers which he requires. At the present moment that feeling of distrust and jealousy of the Central Board which has prevailed ever since the enactment of the Poor Law thirty-two years ago, seems to have subsided for a while. Perhaps this is the first time since the creation of the Board when a reproach that it does not act with sufficient rigour would not be received with ridicule. It is the antagonism to that Board on the part of the public which has prevented the full development of the law, and the right hon. Gentleman must concur that it has in consequence been almost impossible to give effect, until very recently, to its provisions. To the same hostile feeling, he must also know, the appointment of the Committee to which he himself alluded, is to be attributed. That feeling was at its height in 1860, when an application was made for the renewal of the Poor Law Commission. All that had ever been said against the Board was then urged by Members representing important constituencies; and, notwithstanding the appeal which was made by Lord Palmerston, Sir George Lewis, and other distinguished persons, there was a majority against the renewal of the Commission for the usual period, and against the Government of no less than 3 to 1. The Commission was, however, renewed for a shorter period than was proposed, on the undertaking that a searching inquiry should be instituted into the administration of the Poor Law Board from the time of its existence. It was at that time, I think, that upwards of 100 memorials from as many unions were presented to this House, praying that the Board might either be deprived of the powers which it possessed or discontinued altogether. Thus matters stood in 1860, and in the following year a Committee was appointed to investigate the subject. That Committee was not appointed by the Government, but was emphatically a Committee appointed by this House voluntarily. There was a most unusual number of Members placed upon that Committee for the purpose of making a searching investigation into the operation of the law, and so strong was my feeling upon that occasion that it was a question as to whether the Board should be continued or not, that I stated to the Committee that it would be improper for the President of the Poor Law Board to preside over that Committee, and, indeed, it was only in consequence of the great courtesy shown in the unanimously expressed wish that I should take the chair, that I consented to do so. I mention this to show what was at that time the general feeling towards the Central Board, which was censured because, as it was thought, it had not acted with sufficient energy and had not engaged in conflict and collision with the local authorities. For some weeks the Committee were engaged in investigating the charge, which was generally believed throughout the country, that owing to embarrassing and vexatious interference on the part of the Board with the local authorities, the guardians of unions and parishes in London had not been able to make effective arrangement for the relief of the poor during the season of 1861, when swarms of people were thrown out of employment, and were in the greatest distress. There was almost a panic in the metropolis, and the impression was that the guardians would have met the emergency but for the interference of the Poor Law Board. Perhaps the prejudice against the Board was at its height at the period to which I am referring. The Committee began its labours in 1861, and did not bring them to a close till 1864. After having examined witnesses of every class, the Committee, though it commenced the inquiry with some prejudice against the Board, came to the conclusion that the Board ought to be continued, and that the power which was especially objected to—namely, the power of issuing orders which were said to have the effect of law, and therefore to be unconstitutional, ought also to be continued. The Committee also expressed their opinion that these orders had been issued for the benefit of the poor, the persons whom they concerned. Looking at the spirit in which that inquiry was commenced, and the very hostile feeling manifested by the guardians, and, I may almost say, by the public, towards the Central Board, it would not have been prudent on the part of the Board if they had chosen that opportunity to proceed against the guardians in courts of justice, and to engage in what the right hon. Gentleman termed “unseemly collision” with the local authorities. And I think if the right hon. Gentleman shrunk from doing so in the past autumn that I cannot be blamed for not having commenced legal proceedings during the time that the Committee was sitting. I do not complain at all of the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman; but when reflections are cast upon the Board for not having acted with more energy against the local authorities, I wish to remind the House of the state of feeling against the Central Board during that period. If the right hon. Gentleman is able to take action now it is because a better feeling exists towards the Central Board. The right hon. Gentleman, at the commencement of his speech the other night, referred to the opinion of the Committee, that the provision made for the medical relief of the poor was satisfactory, and that they saw no reason to recommend any change in it. I do not think the Committee can fairly be blamed for having come to that conclusion. They examined witnesses, called before them a number of medical men, and had besides a vast amount of documentary evidence on the subject. They also had before them the Reports of two Committees of this House, which were appointed for the distinct purpose of inquiring into that matter, and the recommendations of both those Committees had been faithfully carried out by the Poor Law Board. The Committee arrived at its conclusion in consequence of
